If Dudley don't create in Washington an intense desire for partisan holiness, for political soul-elevation and angelic purity, then it may be said that his intimate association with Ex-Senator Dorsey, the distinguished secretary of the Republican National Committee and eminent star route thief, while in Indiana, has not panned out according to expectations.—[Sentinel.

Honored and Blest.

When a board of eminent physicians and chemists announced the discovery that by combining some well-known valuable remedies, the most wonderful medicine was produced, which would cure such a wide range of diseases that most all other remedies could be dispensed with, many were skeptical; but of its merits by actual trial has dispelled all doubt, and to-day the discoverers of that great medicine, Hop Bitters, are honored and blest by all, as benefactors.—Democrat.

A Fool Once More.

"For ten years my wife was confined to her bed with such a complication of ailments that no doctor could tell what was the matter or cure her, and I used up a small fortune in humbug stuff. Six months ago I saw a United States flag with Hop Bitters on it, and I thought I would be a fool once more. I tried it, but my folly proved to be wisdom. Two bottles cured her. She is now as well and strong as any man's wife, and it cost me only two dollars. Such folly pays."—H. W., Detroit, Mich.—[Free Press.

Longfellow's Home.

Mr. Longfellow's stately dwelling, Craigie House, occupied, as every one knows, by Washington at the siege of Boston—"(This," said the poet, laughingly, to some visitors, "is the headquarters, and the houses which he occupied during his retreat were the hind-quarters,")—has yielded more to the prevailing suburban-villa style of its neighbors, than Elmwood or Shady Hill. It is fitting enough that it should, since by reason of its distinguished owner's accessibility, his constant and varied hospitality, and his social position, it forms, perhaps, the strongest connecting link between society and literature, in or about Boston. The days follow in something like a continuous levee at this old colonial mansion, whose heavy brass door-knocker is plied (or more often gazed at by a deteriorating generation in ignorance as to the mode of handling it) by a long stream of pilgrims of high or low degree, drawn by reverence, or curiosity, or the wish of literary advice. But across the street a piece of pasture land, with some cows munching among some clover and buttercups, and a vista of the sliding Charles and Brighton meadows beyond—upon which the poet can look from behind his magnificant lilacs and lofty—still keep the rural aroma in the air he breathes.—[Harper's Magazine.

Correspondence.

We publish the following letter by politeness of Mr. Sol. Barney, of Spencerville. The writer will be remembered as one of the men who broke into Mr. Barney's dwelling and attempted to rob him and perhaps to kill him and Mrs. Barney. The plucky resistance made by the latter is well remembered, and was, no doubt, the main cause of the failure of the thieves to get their booty and make good their escape. It seems a little strange that McDonald should write to Mr. Barney, but his letter, which we produce, will be read with interest.

MICHIGAN CITY, IND., July 17.

MR. BARNEY:—I take this opportunity to write you a few lines, hoping to find you enjoying as good health as this leaves me at present. Dear sir, you will think it strange to receive a letter from me, but whether you will receive it from such a man as they made me out to be in Auburn, I have some doubts as to whether you will ever answer it. I have been thinking of writing to you for sometime past, but I am such a poor writer I hate to write to any one, but nevertheless I am going to make the attempt to do so, to explain to you my deep regret. I am sorry for the difficulty which has occurred between you and me. But I can assure you it was not my fault. My cousin, May Guthria, and Lew were the cause of all my trouble. I came from the state of New York that fall. My cousin gave me an invitation to call and see her. I left New York for Bay City, Michigan, and on my way I stopped to see my cousin and Lew, and there got into this difficulty, which leaves me to-day where I am. Mr. Barney, you have seen enough of this world to know when a man is moneyless he is friendless. That was the case with me. I do not write to you to flatter you in regard to me. I don't deny what I have been or the life I have led. I have had a great many misfortunes through life. When I am trying to do what in right and live right, every man's hand seems to be against me then I get discouraged and resort to my old habits. Well, dear sir, all I have to say is, that I am heartily sorry for the difficulty which occurred between us. I will come to a close for this time. Give my kindest regards to Mrs. Barney. I felt sorry for her that night, I never forget that I had a mother myself once. I will bid you adieu for this time.

ALEXANDER MCDONALD.

J. Kahn & Co.,

of Waterloo, are doing a thriving business. We had occasion to call on them the other day, and took a look over the establishment. Their stock of goods is a mammoth one, and their annual sales surprisingly great. The joke was on us when we innocently asked if they expected to sell all these goods this year. The reply was that the stock would be cleaned out in two or three months, in time for the new fall stock. Kahn, himself is living in Chicago, and keeps the boys posted as to goods and bargains. In the store, you will find Jacob Lowenstein, B. Rothschild, E. N. Beidler, F. E. Adams and Isaac Mannheimer, any one of whom will be found gentlemanly and accommodating, and give you as good bargains as you can get anywhere.

—Last week's Butler Record contained a most exhilarating and sensational item about a lady who wanted a tooth pulled and three dare-devil doctors who attacked the rebellious molar. Friend Weamer ought to remember that this is a hot summer and not tempt the gods too much.

—Wednesday night of last week Mr. Samuel McKinly, of Jackson township, was with a little five-year-old son returning home late, from work at a neighbor's, when the horses they were riding, as well as Mr. M. himself, became so confused by the flashes of lightning and the ensuing darkness, that they could not reach home, and remained in the woods under such shelter as the trees afforded, all night.

—The selection of what hotel to stop at, is often a perplexing conundrum to the visitors in a large city. To any visiting Chicago, this difficulty is easily avoided, as there is now visiting us B. L. Newman, esq., of that city, junior member of the firm of Newman Bros., proprietors of those two well-known hotels, Burdick House and Barnes House. These houses are centrally located in the heart of the city, adjacent to railroad depots and wholesale houses and are in every way suited to the traveling public. The hosts are young in years, but old in experience, and we are sure no effort on their part will be wanting to make their guests comfortable. There is a large restaurant in connection. Prices moderate. 30 2t.

"Busted" Base-Ball Betters.

The Pleasant Lake base-ball club "came down like the wolf on the fold" last Saturday, or, to be more modern, they looked like the old Scandinavian war god. Thor with hammer in hand ready to smash all opposition. In addition to several armfuls of bats, the inevitable wire gag for the catcher was borne aloft at the head of the column, and was no doubt intended to be borne into the front of the fight like the white plume of King Henry, of Navarre. The people from all the county around gathered to witness the contest. But a flatter fizzle was never known. We are informed that the Waterloo club, hearing that two new members had been added to the Pleasant Lake club since the last game, had also taken two new members. When this became known to the Pleasant Lake club, they refused to play. The Waterloo club then gave them to understand that the new members were not to play, if the Pleasant Lake club would play with its original members, and offered to play with the original nines; then offered to play with five of the original Waterloo club against the Pleasant Lake club. These offers the latter refused to consider. A great deal of chaffing and discussion followed, but at noon it became apparent that no game would be played. A nine composed mainly of Auburn boys was then made up, and a few innings played, when the disappointed spectators went home. There are many here who insist that the Lake boys did not intend to play, but came down with a good deal of the "pomp and circumstance of glorious war" only to make a show, and save the money they had put up. If this is true, it does them no credit. And right here let us say to all the boys that this business of putting up money on the game is all wrong. We don't believe a good fair game can be gotten up in this county, in this way. A fair game, played for the fun of the thing, or the honor of winning, is the only way base-ball can be made an honorable game.

A Model Business House.

It has been but a short time since the clothing and dry goods store, of Isaac Ochs, was located in this place. Yet in this time he has by strict attention to business, and by fair dealing, built up a trade that does great credit to his ability as a business man. His location in the brick block opposite the post office is a good one. He occupies both floors, the first floor being used as the general store for ordinary merchandise of all kinds, such as dry goods, notions, boots and shoes, hats and caps, groceries &c. The second floor is filled to overflowing with a complete assortment of clothing for men and boys, as well as a full line of carpets and a big reserve stock of boots and shoes. To these branches of the selling department, we must not forget to add the immense amount of business the firm does in the matter of buying produce. We venture to say that few houses in this part of the country are doing more in this line. Call and see them. No trouble to show goods whether you buy or not.

Tri-State Re-Union.

A tri-state re-union of the ex-soldiers of Indiana, Ohio and Michigan, will be held at Butler, DeKalb county, Ind., on Thursday and Friday, August 18th and 19th, 1881, at which time noted gentlemen in civil and military life will be present. Gen. William H. Gibson, the greatest of Ohio's orators, will positively be present. Ex-President Hayes, Gen. Logan, Gen. Sherman and other prominent civil and military gentlemen are invited. Tents provided for veterans. Infantry, cavalry and artillery parade first day. Signal display and bushwhacker's attack on pickets first night. Sham battle by infantry, cavalry and artillery second day. A glorious time. All military organizations invited. Reduced fare on railroads.

Brown Matheny and Johnny Gossage came up from Fort Wayne Saturdap night. Mr. Matheny left the same night for Montana.

Will. Covey, so long connected with the COURIER, left yesterday morning for his home in Little Rock, Arkansas. The office almost seems strange without his familiar face. During his stay here, he had won the regard of many friends by his good qualities of head and heart. Mr. Covey, is a first-class printer, who understands both the theory and practice of his chosen profession, and will win his way wherever he may be. He leaves us with the best wishes of every employe of the office.

—After patient search we have found out who it is that the Republican goes so far out of its way to call a "Jew." If Ike Mannheimer had no christian name, and no surname, and had not lived in Waterloo, lo these many years, and had not been a clerk in Kahn's store, and had been entirely unknown, and had at last "made himself scarce," there would be some apology for a newspaper while giving its readers a description of a runaway, to make the item as little understood as possible by omitting all names. Ike says that as he is willing to do all in his power to make matters satisfactory, and as he does not contemplate making himself very scarce, there is no demand for withholding his name from the article in question. Ike does not wish to be considered the only Jew in the county, and suggests that all be treated alike; that all proper names be omitted from all the advertising and other business patronage with which Jews favor the Republican, and the simple word "Jew" or "Jews" inserted instead. This will place all on the same footing.

New Firm.

The undersigned having entered into a partnership for the purpose of carrying on the painting business in all its branches, would respectfully solicit a continuation of the patronage of the public for anything in their line. Call on us at the old stand.

The Normal began Monday.

The aged mother of John Koon dadie this morning.

B. Rothschild and Henry Kahn went to Fort Wayne Monday.

Mrs. John Sumers took a trip to Pleasant Lake this week, visiting friends.

Miss Clara Brown, of Edgerton, Ohio, was a guest of Miss Fannie Clark over Sunday.

The Normal school enrolled sixty this week. This is a very encouraging turn out.

E. P. Dickinson, of the Press office, gave an entertainment to a few friends Saturday evening.

J. P. McCagno thinks he has logs enough to keep him running all summer. A very unusual thing of late.

Jacob Kahn was at home Saturday. It looks natural to see him at the old corner shaking hands with his customers.

Many were present from Auburn, Butler and Pleasant Lake Saturday to see the game of base ball that didn't come off.

Rev. W. H. Mathews, of Manchester, Michigan, will preach at the Presbyterian church next Sunday afternoon at three o'clock.

The dwelling by the foundry has caught the prevailing fever, and rejoices in a new roof. This must be a good year for dealers in shingles.

Enough wind has been wasted on the base ball business to desolate the town and break down all the shade trees, if it were concentrated and let loose all at once.

Dr. Johnson has added another improvement to his already complete dental establishment, by the introduction of the use of vitalized air, for the extraction of teeth without pain.

T. R. Cool, now yard master of the Lake Shore, at South Bend, writes when renewing his subscription, that he is prospering there, and finds the COURIER a welcome visitor to his new home. Thanks Tom.

The Evangelical and M. E. churches will have a Sunday school excursion to Pleasant Lake to-morrow. The fare for round trip is only thirty cents. This is certainly low enough to induce every one to go, and have a day's enjoyment.

There were no trains on the Lake Shore road for about two days last week, owing to the wash-out east of Goshen. Several hundred feet of the road was destroyed by the high waters Thursday night, and a freight train loaded with cattle and horses was wrecked in the break.

John Lees came near having a serious accident Saturday evening. He was driving through town with his son, H. K. Lees. The horse became frightened at a car of stone standing in the street, on the crossing, and attempted to run. It was prevented from getting away, but in the struggle came in collision with another buggy, driven by Mr. Wareham. Wareham's wheel was broken, but both horses were soon got under control. This should be a warning to parties who persist in unloading cars in the street, especially one so thronged as Main street usually is. Although not strictly to blame for the accident, Mr. Lees promptly took the damaged buggy to the shop to be repaired.

West Richland.

Mr George Keen thinks he will get sixteen quarts of wheat to the acre.

Mr. Eldridge is in favor of having a "good natured fight" on the school house location.

Some preparations are being made for the Tp. S. S. picnic, which is to be held in this neighborhood.

Dr. Spooner, of Peru, Ind., passed here on his way home from a visit to L. Getts, of Noble county last Saturday.

Mr. T. Getts, formerly of this county, now of Noble is sick. Enlargement of the liver and other diseases is the trouble.

The oats have been badly blown down by the recent storms. In some fields the army worms are doing a great deal of damage.

Rev. Mr. Robinson did not come according to appointment Thursday evening, owing to the threatening aspect of the weather.

No more wishing for rain. The rain and thunder storms of Thrsday and Friday nights have been more severe than any we have had for a long time.

Mr. James A. Barns, county superintendent, paid this neighborhood a visit last Friday afternoon. Viewing the grounds where the little fellows will shortly lie.

The music of the steam thresher "is heard in our land." Fried and Haines have purchased a new machine and are doing splendid work. Groh and Friend have rigged up their old thresher and are "separating the chaff from the wheat."

Mr. William Swander and family, Mr. C. Lehner and family, Mr. Joseph Quince and Mr. Henry Harmes spent a day at Rome City last week. That's right. A day on the island with a boat ride and drink of mineral water will do you good.

Some damage has been done by lightning during the storms. Mr. Benj. Hinkley's house, James Smalley's barn and Mr. Helmer's barn were struck. The one belonging to Mr. Helmer, of Corunna, was burned. The other buildings were damaged but little.

The site for the new school house has been selected by the trustee, Mr. Franks. The place decided upon is the present site of the old one. This was not in accordance with the wishes of some of the people of the district, consequently an appeal to the county superintendent was made.

By the appearance of things it is presumed that the grounds along the creek owned by the widow, Norris, Mrs. DePew and P. N. Calkins are to be prepared for a summer resort. Mr. Calkins' fence has been removed and a channel cleared for the passage of boats. In fact a boat has already been launched. It differs somewhat from any in use at Rome City. It has four wheels, and is made in the shape of a common lumber wagon.

Comeskey's Corners.

The farmers have commenced threshing their wheat.

A heavy rainfall with heavy thunder Wednesday night.

The wheat crop is very poor. The average is about six bushels to the acre.

Mr. Wilber Smith has special calls down to his grandfather's.

The children of the Hopewell sabbath-school are preparing for a convention.

Miss Mellie Carnahan and Miss Laura Comeskey visited the huckleberry marsh, but had poor success. They got about a pint of berries.

PUP.

GOIN' HOME TO-DAY.

My business on the jury's done—the quibblin' is all through—
I've watched the lawyers right and left, and given my verdict true;
I stuck so long unto my chair, I thought I would grow in;
And if I do not know myself, they'll get me there ag'in;
But now the court's adjourned for good, and I've got my pay;
I'm loose at last, and, thank the Lord, I'm going home to-day.

I've somehow felt uneasy like, since the first day I came down;
It is an awkward game to play the gentleman in town;
And this 'ere Sunday suit of mine on Sunday rightly sets;
But when I wear the stuff a week, it somehow galls and frets.
I'd rather wear my homespun rig of pepper salt and gray—
I'll have it off in half a jiff when I get home to-day.

I have no doubt my wife looked out, as well as any one—
As well as any woman could—to see that things were done;
For though Melinda, when I'm there, won't set her foot outdoors,
She's very careful, when I'm gone, to tend to all the chores,
But nothing prospers half so well when I go off to stay,
And I will put things into shape, when I get home to-day.

The mornin' that I came away, we had a little bout;
I coolly took my hat and coat, before the show was out.
For what I said was nought whereat she ought to take offense;
And she was always quick at words and ready to commence,
But then she's first one to give up when she has had her say;
And she will meet me with a kiss when I go home to-day.

My little boy—I'll give 'em leave to match him, if they can;
It's fun to see him strut about, and try to be a man;
The gamest, cheeriest, little chap you'll ever want to see!
And then they laugh, because I think the child resembles me.
He'll turn my pockets inside out, when I get home to-day.

My little girl—I can't contrive how it should happen thus—
That God should pick that sweet bouquet and fling it down to us!
My wife, she says that handsome face will some day make a stir;
And then I laugh, because she thinks the child resembles her.
She'll meet me half way down the hill, and kiss me any way;
And light my heart up with her smiles, when I go home to-day.

If there's a heaven upon the earth, a fellow knows it when
He's been away from home a week, and then gets home again;
If there's a heaven above the earth, there often, I'll be bound,
Some homesick fellow meets his folks, and hugs 'em all around.
But let my creed be wright or wrong, or be it as it may,
My heaven's just ahead of me—I'm going home to-day.

THE CONDUCTOR'S STORY.

AN EPISODE OF BIDWELL'S BAR

[Argonaut.]

I think it is Emerson who says: "When you pay your ticket and get into the car you have no guess what good company you shall find there. You buy much that is not rendered in the bill." I have found this remark eminently true on several occasions, particularly when my life-long friend Ruth bears me company.

Ruth is the most unconventional of women. She travels as she does every thing else, with whole-souled earnestness, and finds bread where most people could gather only stones. Thus, recently, being in the rear car of the long train, she preferred standing upon the platform and drinking in at one draught that magnificent valley through which we seemed flying than by tantalizing sips, as one has to do from behind a narrow car window.

I followed her. I always do. And, holding on to the narrow railing, we felt somewhat like two lost comets whirling through space. Soon the door behind us banged, and a gentleman in the midsummer of life, with a face as classically beautiful as Edwin Booth's and a waist of Falstaffian dimensions, joined us. He beamed on us almost literally. From the dimple in his fair, soft chin to the ring of brown, silky hair which lay upon his broad, smooth forehead, the expression scintillated with intelligent good nature. Withal, there was such a retrospective background to the sunny brightness that after a few commonplaces Ruth, the daring, honest, impudent creature, said, looking up meanwhile into his face with a smile so honest and kindly that he would have been a Berserker not to have reflected it:

"Sir, permit me to remark that you are a physical incongruity."

"Not so bad as that, madame, I hope. I am merely a conductor, as by this time you have discovered, and a pretty well balanced one, independent of avoirdupois."

"But your thoughtful face, sir, that is what perplexes me. It should belong to a body but one-third the weight of yours," suggested Ruth, the wise disciple of Lavater.

"My face is all right," he replied, stroking his cheeks and chin with an air of marvelous self-complacency. "It stopped growing ten years ago, but it is here," touching the region of his diaphragm with the tip of his forefinger, "that contentment and my good luck show themselves. Once I was as thin as Peter Schemmel's shadow, and"—he paused, looking into Ruth's clear, gray eyes as if he would sound her soul's depths—"I am strongly tempted to tell you my bit of a romance, for there is a long stretch ahead, and you look like one of the kind to enjoy a touch of nature; isn't it so?"

The conductor had struck the very key-note of our needs. We were pining for a veritable California story, told in an unconventional way, outside of the well-read romances of Bret Harte and The Argonaut. To be told, too, under such peculiar circumstances would be an added spice, and thus besought him to immediatly yield to temptation.

"I am an old stager," he said, "at least as far back as the spring of 1850. With a blanket strapped upon my back, fifty cents in my pants' pocket and the biggest stock of hope and unused energy that ever made a lad's heart as light as a balloon, I tramped along here in my search for the 'gold diggings.' My ambition was higher than those buttes yonder by thousands of feet, and the top was to be capped by solid gold," pointing as he spoke to the three singular and isolated peaks we were just then passing, known as the Marysville Buttes, whose volcanic heights looked as inaccessible to us as their peaks seemed brown and barren.

"It appears to me," said Ruth, measuring the most precipitous sides of those lofty and mysterious hills, "that when a man aspires to touch the sky he would want a higher guerdon than mere gold, not, however, that I hold the metal in contempt."

"I had, madame, and that was the whole matter. I was desperately in love—that was a solemn fact, expressed in as few words as possible—and I believe that she loved me, but the top of Mt. Shasta was not more unattainable to me than Jennie. Her father, an old Philadelphia druggist, had money, and I had none. He was as proud as Lucifer, and as ambitious for his daughter as he was proud. I felt that I could 'move a mountain,' if I could find a mountain to move; so Jennie and I said good-bye one afternoon under an old oak in Fairmount Park, and in the very depths of my heart I believed that she would be true to me. It was not a severe, seven days' ride in a palace car from New York to San Francisco in those days, and the tall, slender, hungry, penniless lad who tramped along here twenty-nine years ago, seeking his fortune like another Dick Whittington, was a weary and homesick one as well."

"By 'here,' which you have twice used, do you mean this veritable Valley of the Sacramento?" said Ruth.

"The very same. My objective point was a place now famous in the annals of that period, called 'Bidwell's Bar,' on account of a rich bar in the Feather River, full of golden sand, which was discovered by General Bidwell. The place was many miles from me; the country was thinly settled; I did not know a soul (for even tramps were scarce in those early days), and so my courage and my legs gave out together. Pulling off my boots about 5 o'clock one sultry day, I bared my blistered feet to the cool evening breeze, and, creeping into a clump of young manzanitas, fell asleep, hoping that I would never awake again this side of the stars. I did, however, conscious that my toes were being licked in a gentle fashion, and discovered that it was being done by a brown setter dog, about as hungry-looking and generally dilapidated as I was myself.

"Where he came from I never knew, but, looking into his half-human eyes, we speedily entered into a sort of dumb compact to trudge on together. I found that the poor fellow (I never could call him a brute) had a sore knee, inflamed and bleeding. I tore a strip off from my last handkerchief to bind it up, and, in place of the Good Samaritan's oil and wine, gave him my last scrap of cold bacon. It is strange, but forlorn as I was in those days, I recall them with a tender pleasure almost unaccountable. If I had been raised a Brahmin I would have believed that some immortal spirit of unfailing cheerfulness and unending resources was imprisoned in that dog's body. Did you ever read the fairy legend of the 'White Cat,' who, after she had persuaded the young Prince, her lover, to cut off her head and tail and throw them in the fire, suddenly stood before him a woman, as fair as Aurora. Fritz, for that was the name by which I called the dog, looked at me with Jennie's brown eyes, half roguish, half thoughtful, and together we resumed our journey. Nor would I have followed in the wake of the young Prince, even had I known the result would have been similar, for Fritz, the dog, was invaluable just as he was. All lonesomeness was gone now that he rarely left my side, and, although our shadows had grown less by the time we reached the 'bar,' our immaterial entities were in prime order for everything in the shape of adventure. 'Have never seen any gold dug.' Then I'll not at this late day spoil your first impressions of a miner's camp by describing mine as I approached Bidwell's Bar. I may say, though, that one might have supposed an earthquake or tornado had been there, tearing up the hundreds of thousands of cubic feet that had been moved and removed by mortal hands in their frantic and persistent search for gold.

"The 'bar' was a world in miniature. Almost every nationality was there represented, and almost every feature of human kind but humanity. Armed with a pick, pan and shovel, I, like hundreds of others, began to dig and burrow and wash dirt. But my labor and its results would not balance, for somehow my little leather bag of gold dust got no heavier, toil as I would. Wages being good, I stopped digging and hired myself as a camp-scullion. I did every kind of jobbing within the range of a miner's wants. Washing dirty flannel shirts and cottons overalls, patching leather trousers and cooking flapjacks is not the most dignified and flower-strewn path to fortune, you must know; and to a boy whose ideas of chivalry, independence and deeds of knightly valor were purely and intensely Byronic, such a fate you must acknowledge, was a sort of poetic injustice. My aim, though, was to earn enough money with which to buy a certain claim of which I knew, and that I had, in advance, labeled 'Bonanza.'

"I might have succeeded, but I was prostrated by a malarial fever, and for days and weeks lay unconscious at the tender mercies of a few rough Welsh miners with human hearts. My little hoard of money and my energy melted away together like spring snow. But for Fritz I'd have died of disappointment alone. He had adopted the 'Never say die' motto, and as I often read in his glorious eyes the sentence, 'You great coward! At him again!' as a tender and appreciative sympathy which the gift of speech could not have made more assuring. My nurses had pitched me a tent on the south side of a low hill, and had left me to get well at my own leisure. My 'bottom dollar' had dwindled to the value of a dime, my legs to thickness of a pair of tongs (for all appetite was gone,) and one evening hope failed me. Believing I was going to die, I resolved to do the fair thing by Jennie, apprise her of the event and advise her to forget me. By the flickering light of a bit of tallow candle I began the letter, the first I had written for months. I thought aloud and wrote. Fritz lay beside me, his nose wedged between his paws, but I knew by the twitch of his ears that he understood every word I was writing.

"I had reached the climax of renunciation and wretchedness—or, rather, my expression of it—when he suddenly rose and went out. I soon heard him pawing and scratching and tearing the earth about six feet from me, as though he were under contract to dig a tunnel to China before daylight. Thinking he had found the burrow of a wolf or fox, I called him off, but he was as deaf as a rock to my voice. Seizing the candle, I hurried to the spot, around which lay a half bushel of gravel which he had loosened, when my eye caught the gleam of a dull, red streak that veined a piece of quartz about the size of an egg lying among the fresh earth. Would you believe it? That streak was worth $50, for it was virgin gold. Nor was it the only one upon that hillside. Fritz had found a lode (thanks to the gopher), and I thereby had found a fortune. As soon as possible I had the gold of that precious stone wrought into a ring of my own designing—all of it, at least, but the contents of one blunt corner, which, in its native roughness, I had mounted as a brooch. Sending these to Jennie, I—"

"An act of great generosity, sir, I think," interrupted Ruth with a laughing glint in her eye. "One would have thought you'd have preserved such a piece of rare good fortune as a memorial and stone."

"You anticipate me, madam. It was as a memorial that I sent my first bit of treasure, but I expected to get it back again within two years, and the girl with it."

"And did you?"

"No; nor even received a line of acknowledgement that my offer had been accepted. Nothing finds gold quicker than gold, when a man has once got a fair share of it, and in two years I had, in various ways, secured $30,000. Investing it, as I thought safely, I returned to Philadelphia in all the pride of a conquering hero. My story ought to end here; to wind up with the chime of wedding bells and a 'beautiful Rachel' as my reward for faithful serving; but I had scarcely arrived when I heard, incidentally, that Jennie had gone with her father to Europe, nor left no sign that she ever remembered me."

"You certainly did not let that fact dampen the ardor of your pursuit?" queried Ruth; "you followed her, of course."

"I did no such thing, madam. I returned to San Francisco, and plunged into the excitement of gold hunting with a recklessness that a woman can not understand. Six months after and I lost every dollar, but by that time I had learned that experience is worth nothing as solid capital until it has been dearly bought. I whistled my rhyme:

> "Loss and gain, pleasure and pain,
> Balance the see-saw of life, in the sensitive ears of my faithful Fritz, hugged his brown head close to my shoulder—don't laugh, that dog was my friend—rolled up my sleeves, and again went to work with a vigor that I knew meant certain success if the vein held out. It did, and five years afterward I had a bank account which ran largely into the thousands. I invested it in land. By that time I was a bachelor of thirty. Hard knocks and my one big disappointment had shaken all the romance out of me, and when I again went East it was on business connected with the construction of this railroad."

"And you have quite outlived your boyish fancy, as heart began to lose its youth?" said Ruth, with the least bit of cynicism in her tone.

"I think Fritz knew," said the conductor quietly. "I had become almost misanthrope for his sake. If I left him to go into society—such as we had—for a few hours, he either whined like a sick child or kept up such an increasing barking and baying that to save him being shot as a nuisance I went to no place where it was impossible for him to accompany me. The old fellow went with me even to New York, and on the journey I often caught myself cogitating how he—born in a wilderness of wild mustard, and as fond of camp-life as an Indian—would take to the constraint of an old city. Well, I had not been in New York a week before there was a strong tugging at my heart to run down to Philadelphia. Not that it was home for me, for my parents had died before I first left it. I called the desire 'the charm of association,' and it led me.

"There, as I went down Arch street, my poor dog lost his wits and the sober dignity of his maturity. He had a remarkably fine scent. I always knew that; but no sooner had we turned into that particular street than, with nose close to the ground and rigid tail, he ran zig-zag to and fro, as though he was on the trail of an erratic fox. I called him, but he gave no heed. People got out of his way. The gamins shouted, and, with a wild, shrill bark, he suddenly bounded into the door-way of a large dry-goods store. I bounded after him in time to see him rush up to a lady in black, who was examining some gloves, and danced around her with signs of the most extravagant joy. There are tones that live without the aid of photographs. 'Roy! Roy! Dear old Roy,' was all she said, but I'd have sworn the voice was Jennie's if I had heard it on the summit of Mount Blanc. A white hand was laid upon his head and my ring was on the hand."

He paused.

"Yours? Sir, I hope you did not claim it," said the practical collocutor.

"I did, and the hand which wore it, just as I originally intended." Nor did Alexander, in his hours of conquest, ever smile a more serene approval of himself than our conductor at this stage of the story.

"But the conduct of Fritz, and the lady's silence, and all the queer concomitants which exist only in fiction—how do you reconcile them with an ow'r true tale?" said Ruth, the truth loving.

"Fritz was Roy, the Roy who had often been caressed by Jennie before his young master, Jennie's cousin, got the gold fever, when I did, and came to California, never to return. Jennie had written, but her letters had never reached me. She thought me dead. Why the dog came to me, when his master died, is one among the riddles of my life which I will disentangle in the hereafter."

"And to-day where is she?"

He stood waiting for the answer.

"On our ranch near Sacramento, and I believe one of the happiest women in the State. We have a boy ten years old, whose name is Fritz, and all the dearer for the sake of the old friend who has gone where I hope one day to meet the human of him. I wish you could stop off a bit and see my wife. Queer, isn't it that I should have introduced this bit of private history upon you? But the truth is— Yes—coming! I'll be with you again; ladies."

A brakeman beckoned him inside, and we had seen the last of our handsome conductor.

The evening shadows had begun to lengthen.

The setting sun had turned the vast plain of the Sacramento Valley into a "field of the cloth of gold," and the distant peaks of the Sierras, clad in eternal snows, but now rose-tinted and glowing, seemed to cleave the azure above them as with a wedge of burnished silver. It was starlight when we reached the end of our car-ride and were registered for the night.

"The conductor's story was a pleasant little episode, Ruth, wasn't it? Do you believe it all happened?" I asked, as I leaned from my pillow to her's to leave a good-night kiss on her round cheek.

"I like Fritz," was the sleepy answer. "There's an instinct about some dogs that the half of mankind can neither appreciate nor maintain. I trust a man whom a good dog loves."

A Norwegian Village.

Vossevangen is a little farming hamlet on the west shore of a beautiful lake. The region is one of the best agricultural districts in Western Norway; the "Voss" farmers are held to be fortunate and well-to-do, and their butter and cheese always bring high prices in market.

As we drove into the village we met the peasants going home from church; the women in short green or black gowns, with gay jackets and white handkerchiefs made into a flying buttress sort of head-dress on their head; the men with knee-breeches, short vests and jackets, thick trimmed with silver buttons. Every man bowed, and every woman courtesied as we passed. To pass any human being on the highway without a sign or token of greeting would be considered in Norway the height of ill-manners; any child seen to do it would be sharply reproved. Probably few things would astonish the rural Norwegians more than to be told that among the highly civilized it is considered a mark of good breeding, if you chance to meet a fellow-man on the highway, to go by him with no more recognition of his presence than you would give to a tree or stone wall.

It is an odd thing that a man should be keeping the Vossevangen Hotel to-day who served in America's civil war, was for two years in one of the New York regiments, and saw a good deal of active service. He was called back to Norway by the death of his father, which made it necessary for him to take charge of the family estate in Vossevangen. He has married a Vossevangen woman, and is likely to end his days there, but he hankers for Chicago, and always will. He keeps a fairly good little hotel on the shores of the lake. In one corner of the dining-room was a large round table covered with old silver for sale; tankards, chains, belts, buttons, coins, rings, buckles, brooches, ornaments of all kinds—hundreds of dollars' worth of things. There they lay, day and night, open to all who came; and they had done this, the landlady said, for years, and not a single article had ever been stolen; from which it is plain that not only is the Norwegian honest himself, there must be a contagion in his honesty which spread it to all travelers in his country.—Atlantic.

The Argument of a Loaded Gun.

"Talking about those times right after the war, we certainly did have a branch establishment of hell down in Shreveport. Such a reign of terrorism I never saw, and never expect to witness again. The town was held by colored troops. There were about 100,000 bales of cotton there at the time, and orders had been issued against smoking on the streets. Some of our men, through force of habit, had forgotten the order, and some three or four had been shot down in cold blood for having a cigar in their mouths. One day, as a New Orleans packet came up to the wharf, I saw Maj. Duffie, of the 'lost cause,' one of the bravest devils that ever breathed, and he was evidently going to land. I noticed that he was smoking as he stepped ashore, and I took the first chance to inform him of the order. He laughed and said: 'Oh, pshaw! That'll do well enough to play on boys and old women, but it won't do on me, Vest.'

"I cautioned him again, feeling sure there would be trouble in the camp if any of those darky sentinels should see him. We walked up into town, he smoking all the time, and got along well enough, till suddenly a big negro stepped out from behind a corner, and, leveling his musket about five feet from Duffie's head, observed:

"'Drop dat cigah!'

"Duffie surveyed the muzzle of that instrument about a second and a half, and then he dropped it.

"'Tramp out de spahks!' was order number two, the musket meanwhile keeping its unpleasant position.

"Duffie tramped.

"'Tramp out dose uddah spahks!' again commanded the darky. 'Dat's enough. Now you kin move along.'

"I was an amused observer of this episode, but had nothing to say until we had got off a few feet, when I meekly asked:

"'Duffie, take a fresh cigar?'

"I don't think he was favorably impressed with the personal liberty in and around Shreveport; but I tell you, gentlemen, there is more solid argument in a loaded shot-gun than all the decisions of the Supreme Court."

The Laplander.

The Laplander's sledge has no runners, but, like himself, it is covered with reindeer skin, and is in shape something like a canoe. Harnessed to this sledge, the reindeer starts off with almost the rapidity of the steam engine, going fifteen or twenty miles an hour.

The reindeer is not only the Laplander's horse, but his cow, and, during the time that it gives milk, he is freezing large quantities of it, to be used when no more is obtained. Then he breaks off a piece, warms it out, and has again a good article of milk.

The deer is also his food, large herds of them being kept in some parts of the country. From its skin the Laplander makes the roof and floor of his house, his bed, his shoes, and stockings, his clothes, and cords and strings for his bow. Without this animal, the Laplander would be in a deplorable condition.

THE increase of the value of French railways in 1880 over 1879 was $22,240,000.

FACTS FOR THE CURIOUS.

CARRIER-PIGEONS often exhibit a remarkable love of music, and they are exceedingly fond of aromatic odors.

WHENEVER any one of a herd of hyenas, in their native state, is wounded its companions tear it to pieces and devour it.

JELLY-FISHES can live cut in two for an indefinite period. Halves of them will swim along as if nothing had happened.

THERE is a pair of scales in the New York Assay Office of a kind so delicate that, when brought to a balance with two pieces of paper of equal size in the pans, the mere writing of a name with lead pencil on one of the pieces of paper will add enough weight to the paper to turn the scales in its favor.

WHEN a lion is roused he never goes directly forward, but takes an oblique course, receding with a slow, proud motion, going from one side to the other, and bounding rather than running. The lion is a long-lived animal; in his native forest his age exceeds that of man. When a lioness fears lest her retreat may be discovered she often hides her tracks by brushing them out with her tail.

IT is said that the bats of Java seldom fail to attack such persons as lie in the open air with their extremities exposed; and they are so dexterous in this operation that they can insinuate their aculeated tongue into a vein, and continue to draw the blood without being perceived; and that during all the time they are engaged, they agitate the air with their wings in so pleasing a manner as to throw the sufferer into a sounder sleep than he was before.

THE common flea lives by sucking the blood of man; and of some species of quadrupeds and birds. It abounds particularly in the nests of poultry, pigeons and swallows, and wherever sand and dust accumulate in the chinks of floors; it is to be found also plentiful in beds, wherever cleanliness is neglected. Fleas undergo a complete metamorphosis. The female lays about a dozen eggs of a white color, and slightly viscous. The larvæ is a lively little worm, at first white, afterward reddish, and destitute of feet.

THERE are at present in the Old World and in the New World more than 100,000 railway locomotives. Their total force is equal to 30,000,000 horse-power, and all the other steam engines on the globe are estimated at 46,000,000 horse-power. The technical "horse-power," however, is really equal to three average horses, and each horse to about seven men, the aggregate power, therefore, of all the engines being vastly more than the effective force of all the human workers living. Four-fifths of the steam engines now at work have been made within a quarter of a century or so.

SOME of the washing waters of Paris, which were formerly run into the sewers, are now collected in casks, and, the suds being subjected to chemical treatment, the fatty matters are being manufactured into toilet soap, made fragrant by the addition of oil of rose. According to this process a little sulphuric acid is added to the soap water obtained from washing linen, the whole is then stirred up, and the fatty matter is allowed to stand for a few hours, when, on its collecting upon the surface of the liquid, it is gathered in casks. Instead of sulphuric acid, sulphate of iron or ferruginous sulphate of alumina may be employed, by the action of which the separation of the fatty matter is obtained, being precipitated in the form of an insoluble soap. After the action of these metallic salts the operation may be terminated by the addition of milk of lime.

Portuguese Shepherds.

On the hill-side, under the oak trees, we see a child tending her flock and spinning with distaff and spindle. Such a sight is very common; little girls have much to do with domestic animals; they run fearlessly between the long horns of the great tawny oxen, and guide them in the way they should go with a shower of blows on their long-suffering foreheads and muzzles. They milk the goats and herd the swine, and grow lithe and strong of limb and nut-brown of face in the warm sun. The herdsmen and shepherdesses beguile their lonely watch with the peculiar antiphonal songs of the country, which often display remarkable wit in repartee on the part of the improvisatores, as well as a ready talent for rhyming. These songs are composed as well in Spain as in Portugal. One shepherd challenges another to a tournament in verse, and begins by singing a stanza which is to serve as a key-note to the whole production, as well in the kind of measure to be used as in tune. In one of these lyrical ballads, which, so far as I know, has never crept into print, a man begins a song half in banter, half in earnest:

> "It is better to love a dog than to love a woman,
> For a piece of gold a woman will leave you to grief,
> But the affection of a dog is endless."

A woman, who perhaps has had some experience of the improvidence as well as of the voracity of mankind, replies, in ready caricature of the other:

> "It is better to feed a dog than to feed a man,
> For with a piece of meat a dog will leave you in peace,
> But the hunger of a man will last forever."

And the keen, sharp-shooting is kept up through a long range of topics, the ball tossed back and forward from one skillful composer to another, and when improvisation fails, traditional badinage is remembered and sung with equal gusto.—L. W. Champney, in Harper's Magazine.

Nose and Face.

A somewhat singular fact has been observed with reference to the shape of the nose, or rather, the setting of it in the face, so to speak. To be strictly correct, from the artist's point of view, the nose should be accurately in the middle of the face, and at right angles with a line from the pupil of one eye to that of the other. As a matter of fact, it is rarely or never found thus placed; it is almost invariably a little out of "the square," and the fact of its being so is often that which lends a peculiar expression and piquancy to the face. A medical writer points out that there are anatomical reasons why a slight deviation from the true central line may be expected, and that the nose which is thus accurately straight between the two eyes may, after all, be considered an abnormal one; the only absolutely true and correct organ being, in fact, that which thus deviates a little to the right or left.

Dr. Harter's

IRON TONIC

Is a preparation of Protoxide of Iron, Peruvian Bark and the Phosphates, associated with the Vegetable Aromatics. Endorsed by the Medical Profession, and recommended by them for Dyspepsia, General Debility, Female Diseases, Want of Vitality, Nervous Prostration, Convalescence from Fevers and Chronic Chills and Fever. It serves every purpose where a TONIC is necessary.

Manufactured by The Dr. Harter Medicine Co., St. Louis.

Gentlemen:—Some three months ago I began the use of DR. HARTER'S IRON TONIC, upon the advice of many friends who knew its virtues. I was suffering from general debility to such an extent that my labor was exceedingly burdensome to me. A vacation of a month did not give me much relief, but on the contrary, was followed by increased prostration and sinking chills. At this time I began the use of your IRON TONIC, from which I realized almost immediate and wonderful results. The old energy returned and I found that my natural force was not permanently abated. I have used three bottles of the TONIC. Since using it I have done twice the labor that I ever did in the same time during my illness, and with double the ease. With the tranquil nerve and vigor of body, has come also a clearness of thought never before enjoyed. If the TONIC has not done the work, I know not what. I give it the credit.

Most gratefully yours,
J. P. WATSON,

SCRAPS OF SCIENCE.

A CURIOUS instance of the deodorizing of illuminating gas was recently cited by Prof. Bunsen. In Dresden a quantity of gas escaped from a pipe outside of a dwelling and passed through the earth into the house, with its odor entirely gone. It was breathed unconsciously, and several deaths occurred in consequence.

SOME interesting archæological discoveries have just been made in Algiers, near the sea-coast, on the seat of the ancient Utica. The remains of a temple consecrated to the infant Hercules; a statuette of the god in white marble, evidently Greek; a Bacchus, life-size, also in white marble; and a number of fine mosaics, seem to indicate the probability of a great "find."

THE great telescope just completed by Howard Grubb of Dublin for the Vienna Observatory is the largest refractor now in existence. The steel tube is thirty-three and one-half feet in length, and the instrument weighs near seven tons. The object glass is twenty-seven inches in diameter, while that of the great telescope at Washington, hitherto the largest in the world, measures twenty-six inches.

THE use of the electric telegraph in Arctic exploration seems excellent and practical. By such aid sledge parties could be kept in communication with the main body of the expedition. The wires would be made as light as possible, and laid along the snow or ice or the frozen ground, either of which would sufficiently insulate the wires without the use of the usual poles and glass insulators.

AT THE Paris observatory Thollon is carefully studying the sun's surface and has described a number of interesting hydrogen explosions, appearing like gigantic displays of fireworks, and sometimes remaining visible for two days. One of them sent forth a stream of fire to a hight of more than 200,000 miles—a distance nearly equal to that of the moon from the earth—while explosions reaching to a hight of 25,000 to 50,000 miles are by no means infrequent.

AN ACCOUNT was recently given to the British Royal Society, of the transplanting of a bone, the first successful instance of the kind ever recorded. A piece of diseased bone had to be removed from the arm of a boy of three years in a Glasgow infirmary. Fifteen months after the operation no new bone formation had appeared, and the experiment of bone-grafting was undertaken. On three different occasions portions of human bone were transplanted, the grafts being taken from patients from whom wedges of bone had to be removed for the purpose of straightening their limbs. These wedges were divided into many small pieces and placed in the child's arm. The fragments grew together and adhered to the bone of the arm above and below, ultimately converting a useless arm into a thoroughly useful one by the formation of a complete bone.

SOME conception of the enormous energy of the human heart may be formed when it is considered that a good climber can only ascend 9,000 feet in nine hours—that is, working continuously for a considerable time, can only raise his own weight 1,000 feet an hour—while the work done by the heart is equivent to raising its own weight (ten ounces) 13,860 feet high every hour. A still more striking illustration of the great power of this little organ may be found by comparing it with the most powerful engine ever made by man—the Bavarian locomotive, of the Vienna and Trieste Railway—which can only raise itself through 2,700 feet an hour. That is, its energy is less than one-fifth that of the human heart. Of course, the actual work done, by both engine and climber, is much greater in amount than that done by the heart, but relative to the weight, the energy of the heart far exceeds the other two.

Sign Lore.

A gentleman advertised in one of our daily papers for an ice chest to hold so many pounds of ice and a new harness. The wonder was why he wanted to keep his new harness in an ice chest, until it was noticed to be an error in punctuation.

A barbers sign once read:

"What do you think
I'll shave you for nothing and give you a drink."

When his customers asked him for the drink and refused to pay, he took them outside and read to them:

"What! do you think

Detached sentences often present a quaint expression:

"Job printing!" said an old lady, reading the familiar sign, "poor man, he must be awful tired of it, for he's been at it ever since I can remember!"

In a druggist's window at Chicago there was for many years a sign: "Artificial eyes," and immediately under it: "Open all night."

A merchant once told a sign painter he wanted a neat sign with a couplet in rhyme, painted in gold letters; when the man brought the sign the inscription read:

"Sugar and tea sold."

The merchant asked angrily where the rhyme was, when the painter read it to him:

"Sugar and tea

A sign on a tobacco factory reads: "Twenty boys wanted to strip."

"Shirts re-enforced" is the legend in a Detroit dry goods store. It means that they are provided with double yokes.

"Pocket-books reduced to fifteen cents," was the notice in a store window, and a wag passing remarked that he was reduced to nothing.

In Pennsylvania there was an old house called the Harrowgate. In front of it and directly on the sidewalk hang an old gate with this inscription:

"This gate hangs well and hinders none;
Refresh, and pay and travel on;
Good ale for nothing to-morrow."

Another sign reads:

"I, Patrick Holyroott, live here,
I sell good porter, ale and beer;
I've made my sign a little wider
To let you know I keep good cider."

A Husband's Revenge.

A Detroit man detected his wife and a neighboring man planning an elopement. He allowed them to proceed undisturbed to a certain point, and then called in a policeman. The result is thus related: He took a lamp and led the way to the woodshed. The neighbor, dressed in his Sunday suit, was tied up in one corner, and the recreant wife occupied an empty dry-goods box in the other. "Got 'em last night at 9 o'clock," said the husband," and I've put in the whole day telling 'em what I think of such business. Guess I'd better let 'em off now, hadn't I?" The officer thought so, and the neighbor was released, led to the door, and the husband said: "Now you trot, and if you ever try to run away with my wife again I'll—I'll be hanged if I don't go and tell your wife about it!" He then turned to his wife, untied the cords, and said: "I guess you feel ashamed of this, and there ain't no need to say any more about it. I ain't very mad this time, but if you try it again there's no knowing what I may do." "Well!" gasped the officer, as he drew a long breath. "Well, didn't I git 'em?" chuckled the husband, in proud delight. "I may look like a spring chicken, but I'm no fool, and don't you forget it!"

FELL AGAINST A SHARP EDGE.

[From the Rockford (Ill.) Register.]

This is furnished by Mr. Wm. Will, 1613 Frankford Ave., Philadelphia, Pa.: Some time since I received a severe injury to my back, by falling against the sharp edge of a marble step, the stone penetrating at least a half-inch, and leaving a very painful wound. After suffering for a time, I concluded to apply St. Jacobs Oil, and am pleased to say that the results exceeded my expectations. It speedily allayed all pain and swelling, and by continued use made a perfect cure. I really think it the most efficacious liniment I ever used.

FEELING THE EARTH MOVE.

Account of Some Curiosities of the Wind by a Philosopher on the Roof.

[New York Sun.]

"Would you like to feel the motion of the earth whirling on its axis just as you feel the motion of a buggy by the air driven against your face?"

The man who asked this singular question looked both sane and serious. As he spoke he touched with his finger a small globe, which, with the slight impulse thus communicated, began to revolve smoothly and swiftly within a brass ring and a broad wooden zone, on which were pictured the odd-looking figures that represent the twelve signs of the zodiac. The green painted oceans and the variously tinted continents on the little globe blended into a confused jumble of color with the motion. Europe and America, the Atlantic and the Pacific lost their outlines. Greenland made a dark circle about the pole like a streak on a boy's top.

"You know the earth is whirling like that—many times faster than that," said the philosopher, "and if the atmosphere did not partake of the same motion there would be a constant hurricane blowing at the rate of a thousand miles an hour. Most persons accept the explanation that the atmosphere revolves as fast as the solid ground without inquiring any further, and so they lose sight of one of the most startling facts in nature. Just step up here."

The reporter followed the philosopher to the flat roof of the house.

"Don't you feel that?" asked the philosopher, putting his hand to his cheek.

"I feel a wind from the northeast," replied the reporter.

"Well, that's it, then," said the philosopher. "As the surface of the earth revolves eastward, it meets a current of air flowing from the north, which has not yet acquired a velocity of rotation equal to that of the ground it passes over. So objects on the earth are driven by the earth's motion through air that is moving more slowly to the eastward than they are. The result is that the wind which started to blow from the poles toward the equator, instead of moving straight from north to south appears to come from the northeast. The reason of this will be plain the minute you look at a revolving globe. You see that close to the poles the revolution of the surface is very much slower than at the equator, just as a point on the hub of a wheel moves more slowly than a point on the tire.

"You must not, however, suppose that every wind from the northeast is the result of this curious law. In fact, in this latitude it is very difficult to say when the true wind of revolution, if I may so speak of it, is felt, because there are so many local causes that govern the direction of the wind. Nevertheless, whenever a current of air starts from the far north toward the equator, this phenomenon will be experienced in all the places it passes over, although it is very often obscured by the changes of direction caused by ranges of mountains, great valleys and local temperatures. But the curious fact remains that we can feel in the wind the whirling of our globe about its axes. In the tropics this phenomenon manifests itself perfectly in the famous trade winds. In fact the west and southwest winds that prevail here a large part of the year are the returning trade winds. In this case the air, moving from the equator, where the revolution is fastest toward the poles where it is slowest, has, as it advances, a westward motion greater than that of the surface over which it passes. So marked is the prevalence of this wind that sailors call it 'down hill' from here to England on account of the easy sailing with the wind. So, you see, that, although the winds alone would never enable us to detect the fact that the earth revolves, yet now that the fact is known, we see in them one of its most striking results."

Standing on His Dignity.

A prohibitionist went into a saloon, under the influence of liquor, and asked a prominent politician to treat.

"You can't be thirsty again. You have just had a drink."

"Of course (hic) I'm not thirsthy," was the indignant response. "If I don't drink except when I ish thirsthy, what advantage have I got over a beasht of the field?"

Nose, Toes, Etc.

Said a prim teacher to the class in composition; "Make a rhyming couplet including the words nose, toes, corn, kettle, ear, two and boil." There was a silence for a little while, and then a boy held up his hand in token of success. "Read the couplet," said the teacher, and the boy read:

A boil in the kettle is worth two on your nose,
And a corn in the ear is worth two on your toes.

CREAM of tartar rubbed upon soiled white kid gloves clean them well.

CUT hot bread or cake with a hot knife, and it will not be clammy.

MOTHS will eat the all-wool reps, but not the mixed silk and cotton upholstering.

CAMPHOR placed in drawers or trunks will prevent mice from doing them any injury.

CEILINGS that have been smoked by a kerosene lamp should be washed off with soda water.

SINGLE cream is cream that has stood on the milk twelve hours. It is best for tea and coffee.

IN BOILING eggs put them in boiling water. It will prevent the yoke from coloring black.

IN MAKING a crust of any kind, do not melt the lard in flour. Melting will injure the crust.

CREAM that is to be whipped should not be butter cream, lest in whipping it change tc butter.

A FINE comb loosens the dead skin of the scalp just as friction rubs off the scarf skin of the body.

A FEW dried or preserved cherries, with stones out, are the very best thing possible to garnish sweet dishes.

DOUBLE cream stands on its milk twenty-four hours, and cream for butter frequently stands forty-eight hours.

IN POTOSI the most violent headaches, so very common there, are cured by putting the feet in hot water.

A SOLUTION of common salt given immediately is said to be a successful remedy for strychinia poisoning.

SALT extracts the juices of meat in cooking. Steaks ought therefore not to be salted until they have been broiled.

IN BOILING dumplings of any kind, put them in the water one at a time. If they are put in together they will mix with each other.

THE only sure and efficient way to warm cold feet is to dip them in cold water and then rub them dry briskly with a coarse towel.

TO BEAT the white of eggs quickly put in a pinch of salt. The cooler the eggs the quicker they will froth. Salt cools and also freshens them.

THERE is a greenness in onions and potatoes that renders them hard to digest. For health's sake put them in warm water for an hour before cooking.

WHEN washing oil-cloths, put a little milk in the last water they are washed with. This will keep them bright and clean longer than clear water.

FURNITURE needs cleaning as much as other wood-work. It may be washed with warm soap suds, quickly wiped dry and then rubbed with an oily cloth.

TO MAKE silk which has been wrinkled appear exactly like new, sponge it on the surface with a weak solution of gum arabic or white glue, and iron on the wrong side.

A PASTE made of whiting and benzine will clean marble, and one made of whiting and chloride of soda spread and left to dry (in the sun if possible) on the marble will remove spots.

EGGS coated with butter in which two or three per cent. of salicylic acid has been dissolved and then packed in dry sawdust without touching one another will keep fresh for a year.

[From the Chambersburgh (Pa.) Herald.]

AFTER vainly spending five hundred dollars for other remedies to relieve my wife, I have no hesitation in declaring, that St. Jacobs Oil will cure Neuralgia, says M. V. B. Hersom, Esq., (of Pinkham & Hersom), Boston, Mass., an enthusiastic indorser of its merits.

SUMMER EVENINGS.

Nature draws close to us on summer eves,
  Low whispering her secrets in our ear;
Her warm breath stealing over cheek and brow;
  She seems a gracious presence, sitting near

Striving with sweet persuasion to make known
  The love and gladness lying at her heart;
Thrilling in every fiber with His life,
  Of which our own, though discordant, is part.

As lovers slowly walking 'neath the stars
  Speak not from very fullness of delight,
So, nature hushing every ruder sound,
  Woos us in whispers, through the summer's night.

A scent of roses in the dusky gloam,
  And young birds twittering in the early dawn,
  And ghostly shadows flickering on the lawn.

The poet knows their meaning in his heart,
  But, when he tries to tell it, finds no words,
This universal language is for all,
  Needs no interpreter; it is the Lord's,

By which he speaks to us through every sense,
  Holding communion with us, day and night,
Bringing us slowly, and by ways unknown,

"Women Never Think."

If the crabbed old bachelor who uttered this sentiment could but witness the intense thought, deep study and thorough investigation of women in determining the best medicines to keep their families well, and would note their sagacity and wisdom in selecting Hop Bitters as the best, and demonstrating it by keeping their families in perpetual health, at a mere nominal expense, he would be forced to acknowledge that such sentiments are baseless and false.—Picayune.

THE new Municipal Laboratory of Paris for testing food and all articles having a bearing on health, is already accomplishing good results. A large number of samples of wine have been found to be adulterated. Watered milk has been so often found that a panic among the milk-men has resulted. French chocolate has been found to be adulterated with a great variety of substances. The laboratory is in charge of an able chemist with competent assistants. The articles examined are those sent in by the inhabitants of the city, and whenever adulterations are discovered, the matter is immediately placed in the hands of the police for investigation and prosecution. A department of the laboratory is specially fitted up for the examination of pork for trichinæ.

Certain Knowledge.

We know whereof we affirm when we say that Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure has performed more wonderful cures than any medicine ever brought before the American public.

WE KNOW a lady who never hurries her dressmaker. She waits until all the neighbors get through with her. This lady, by the way, is the best posted on village news of any person in town.

Dressing for a Photograph.

"The question is often asked," said an experienced photographer, "why actors and actresses take the most pleasing pictures. It is because they study the principles of art and good taste in their profession and understand how to dress. Moreover, they usually bring a selection of veils, flowers, curls, braids, laces and sometimes costumes to give the photographer a choice of accessories. They come when they are wholly at leisure and are not flustered. A red face takes black, and they know it. Then they do not load themselves down with gewgaws and haberdasheries, to show all that they have got in worldly goods. Few persons know how to dress for a picture like an actress. The best materials for ladies to wear when about to sit for a photograph are such that will fold or drape nicely, like reps, winceys, poplins, satins and silks. Lavender, lilac, sky blue, purple and French blue take very light, and are worse for a picture than pure white. Corn color and salmon are better. China pink, rose pink, magenta, crimson, pea green, buff, plum color, dark purple, pure yellow, Mazarine blue, navy blue, fawn color, Quaker color, dove color, ashes of roses and stone color show a pretty gray in the photograph. Scarlet, claret, garnet, sea-green, light orange, leather color, light Bismarck and slate color take still darker, and are excellent colors to photograph. Cherry, wine color, light apple-green, dark orange, golden and red brown show nearly the same agreeable color in the picture. A black silk always looks well, and it takes well if not bedecked with ribbons and laces that will take white. Dark Bismarck and snuff brown usually take blacker than a black silk or satin and are not easy to drape. A silk, because it has more gloss and reflects more light, usually takes lighter than a woolen dress. Ladies with dark or brown hair should avoid contrasts in their costumes, as light substances photograph more quickly than dark, and ladies with light hair should dress in something lighter than those whose hair is brown. Few ladies understand how to arrange their hair so as to harmonize with the form of the head, but blindly follow the fashion, be the neck long or short, or the face narrow or broad. A broad face appears more so if the hair is arranged low over the forehead or is parted at the side, and a long neck becomes stork-like when the hair is built up high, while a few curls would make a most agreeable change in the effect. Powdered hair gives good effect, and powder should be bestowed upon freckles.—New York Sun.

"I Don't Want that Stuff!"

Is what a lady of Boston said to her husband when he brought home some medicine to cure her of sick headache and neuralgia which had made her miserable for fourteen years. At the first attack thereafter it was administered to her with such good results that she continued its use until cured, and was so enthusiastic in its praise that she induced twenty-two of the best families in her circle to adopt it as their regular family medicine. That "stuff" is Hop Bitters.—Standard.

A DISEASE which is Univers'l requires a Universal Rem'dy and none of the ills to which the human family are subject is more Universal than Fever & Ague, and no remedy has yet been discovered which has proven so universally successful in curing Fever and Ague as KRESS' FEVER TONIC. In many sections of country the atmosphere is filled with malaria, arising from great pools of water left standing from the overflow during last spring, which, becoming stagnant throw out malaria to so great an extent that in order to prevent CHILLS and FEVER from gaining a hold on the system, it is necessary that a remedy should be used which will counteract the evil, and in cases where the disease has taken hold of the system, affect a cure. For this purpose there is nothing equal to KRESS' FEVER TONIC. It is the Best & Safest Remedy known, and wherever used has given perfect satisfaction. In its composition neither Quinine, Arsenic, Strychnine, nor Mercury is used. It will cure the most stubborn cases of AGUE in a very short time and leaves the system strong and vigorous to resist MALARIA. One bottle usually is all that will be required, unless in aggravated cases, or where the patient is continually exposed to malarial poison, in such cases a second bottle may be required. In small doses it will invariably counteract tendency to chills. KRESS' FEVER TONIC is no new remedy, but one long established, thoroughly tested, and found by experience to do all that is claimed for it. In another column will be found the experience of parties who have used it to which we ask your attention. Price One Dollar a Bottle, and is for sale by Druggists, everywhere. TRY IT if you have the slightest tendency to SHAKE! IT WILL CURE YOU!

Circumstantial Evidence.

A lawyer in central New York gives the following account of one of his first cases: My client sued a neighbor for the alleged killing of a favorite dog. The proof consisted in the mysterious disappearance of the animal, and the possession of a dog's skin by the defendant, which, after considerable argument, was brought into court in evidence. It was marked in a singular manner, and was positively identified, with many tears, by the plaintiff's wife and daughter as the undoubted integument of the deceased Bose. In summing up to the jury, I was in the midst of a highly colored picture of the virtues of the deceased, and of the love of the children for their four-footed friend, when I was interrupted by a slight disturbance in the crowd near the door of the little school-house, which served as court-house. Looking around, I saw my client's youngest son, a tow-headed urchin of twelve, coming forward with a dog whose skin was the exact counterpart of the one put in evidence. The dog wagged his tail with good-natured composure, and the boy cried, in his childish treble: "Pa, Bose has come home." I gathered up my law books and retreated, and I have never had perfect confidence in circumstantial evidence since.—[Editor's Drawer, in Harper's Magazine for August.

Why the Scandal was Printed.

Publishing, on Saturday, the particulars of the Platt scandal, the Bangor Commercial said: "We have but one motive in printing the disgraceful details of the scandal which has resulted in the withdrawal of Thomas C. Platt as a candidate for senator at Albany. That motive is to emphasize the proud boast that the republican party comprises the greater part of the decency, morality and respectability of the country. Let it be understood that all of the 'gentlemen' who are named as participants in this 'racy little episode' are leading members of the republican party of the great state of New York. We are thus particular in making this statement, lest some of our city clergymen, who are unfamiliar with the politics of New York, and under whose eye the story printed elsewhere might chance to fall, should feel called upon to refer to it in their pulpits to-morrow as a cause for congratulation that the country did not, at the last election, fall into the hands of the democratic party, whose representatives in New York have again shocked the country by this disgraceful scandal at Albany."

The Great Wheat Fields.

People traveling to the northwest, will be gratified at learning that the "Great Rock Island Route" opens a new line from Chicago to Minneapolis and St. Paul, July 17th, running two through daily trains, leaving Chicago at 12:05 and 5:30 p. m. This new line is to be known as the "Albert Lea Route," and passes through the very best sections of the states of Illinois Iowa and Minnesota, affording travelers a view of the great harvest fields of our country, and a section peopled by the most progressive and prosperous of our northwestern inhabitants.

We understand that round-trip excursion tickets to points in the great wheat region of the Red River of the North, and Missouri River valleys, will be immediately put on sale, good for 40 days from date of issue. This will enable eastern farmers to visit the greatest wheat country on the globe, and see harvesting done on the most gigantic scale.

Surely, no one who really desires to see the west, will forego the opportunity to do so, by ticketing over any other than the "Albest Lea Route," via. West Liberty. The Great Rock Island depot is the most central of any in Chicago, being in the very heart of the city, close to the great hotels, postoffice and leading mercantile houses.

State Room Cars.

This magnificent addition to the mass of comfortable appointments for modern railway travel, originates with the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy railroad, the favorite route from east to west. These cars enable the passengers to enjoy every luxury of first-class hotels; each room being provided with washing, bathing, lounging and sleeping facilities, and also arranged in suites for the convenience of families or traveling parties. The best part about it is, that it costs no more than ordinary sleeping-car accommodations, while it secures complete privacy. If any of our readers contemplate going west, they will do well to secure their tickets via. the Burlington route.

"Mother has Recovered," wrote an Illinois girl to her eastern relatives. "She took bitters for a long time but without any good. So when she heard of the virtues of Kidney-Wort she got a box and it has completely cured her, so that she can do as much work now as she could before we moved west. Since she has got well everyone about here is taking it." See advertisement.

SHEPHERD, ILL., Dec. 31, 1880.—I tried the Fever Tonic and there is no question but that it will break Ague. It did on me.

BETWEEN THE GREEN CORN AND THE GOLD.

Between the green corn and the gold,
  Between the dawning and the noon,
Love, that at first was pale and cold,
  Waxed ruddy with the summer moon;
And hearts beat high, and lips grew bold
Between the green corn and the gold.

The primrose, precious key of spring,
  Unlocked the casket of the year;
The flowers flew forth on rainbow wing
  O'er hill, and mead, and mere,
To woo the new year like the old,
Between the green corn and the gold.

Between the gold corn and green,
  Between the midday and the dawn,
The summer woods have lost their sheen,
  The flowers have withered on the lawn;
And Love lies dead where love hath been,
Between the gold corn and the green.

Love is not dead; he cannot die,
  Although his eyes be veiled with pain;
The woods shall waken by and by,
  The flowers shall blossom once again;
And we—shall we not wake, my Queen,
Between the gold corn and the green?

Correspondence.

SAN JOSE, CALIFORNIA, July 16.

EDITORS COURIER:—As we passed into Arizona, it seemed to me the heat was greater, that is I felt it more, and sought the dressing-room and exchanged my dress basque for a thin white dressing sacque and rode more comfortably for the next few hours. We occasionally came to a small adobe town as we were carried over the undesirable country. The depot buildings were of wood with ordinary roofs, and above these, leaving a space of two or three feet, were sheds of shingles to shade and protect from the severe rays of the sun. The mountains were on either side with the beautiful sky above. The sky, the beautiful sky must be seen here to be appreciated. Can it be that in this unpleasant country the sky is more delicately flecked with gossamer shades or the broad expanse of a lovelier blue than elsewhere, or is it that the heavens and the mountains limiting the horizon contrast so greatly from the surrounding natural ugliness of the the territory? Nearly half way across Arizona, we arrived at a considerable town, called Tucson, on Friday evening, June 17th, about sunset. The heat of the day was much lessened, and the nights here are said to be comfortably cool. Here many of our passengers left, and we received new recruits. There were many soldiers here, I suppose for the purpose of quieting the red man should he become enraged. Here were people of various colors and races, the first Chinamen I had seen on my journey. It was as interesting as an evening's entertainment to watch their pantomimes and listen to the sing-song jargon of their ordinary conversation, looking so queer as they move about with a slip-shod walk, their small feet shoved into the queerest slippers of cloth, pointed at the toe, and an inch thick sole of cork. A hat, peculiar to themselves, covers the head, from the back of which depends the queue of black hair braided very smoothly with black jute and ribbons to lengthen nearly to the heels; wide pantaloons and a large colored shirt lined with white, warm outside. The sleeves loose at the hands, sometimes quite flowing. Shirt and pants made of the same color and material. The houses here were nearly all adobe, and I was told by residents and travelers that they often sleep out of doors to get the air, but have to protect themselves from mosquitoes. Many buy water from the water-man, who fills his cask at the mountains, from some stream issuing from their base. They put the water into an oyer, and set it out doors at night, when it gets pleasantly cool for drink. This oyer is made by the Indians, of clay, something like our crocks. There were some artesian wells in this town, pumped by windmills. Tucson is the largest town in Arizona, but it seemed to me no desirable place to live, with no trees and very little vegetation. Friday night I slept pretty well in my car berth, though it was so warm I had the window opened for outside air, which I had to accept with its accompanying dust, which settled all over my bed, face, eyes and hair. We reached Yuma, on the Colorado river, about five o'clock in the morning, and the passengers said they had a very good breakfast for one dollar. I got a cup of tea and paid twenty-five cents, and ate my own lunch. The damp air from the river was very refreshing as we crossed into California. Did I find it a barren waste yesterday, I find it many degrees more desolate to-day. We made very few stops. After crossing the river, the plain is covered with gravel and nothing growing to be seen anywhere, not even cactus or sage-brush, but soon saw great waves of sand, as though a gritty ocean had risen in turbulent might, and its crested wave, leaping high, stood fast a sand bank; "and not so very fast either," the conductor says, "for when the wind comes with continued force it is removed, sometimes blocking the railroad track, and they have shoveled unsuccessfully for hours to clear the way for the engine, and, becoming very tired, gone into the car to rest and sleep, and on awakening, found the track as clear as though it had never been obstructed, and 'twas necessary to observe closely to see that the track was firm, for this fitful wind, sometimes a friend, sometimes a foe, treacherously removes or loosens the foundations of the road, stretching great rifts and billows of clear yellow sand as far as the eye can follow." The conductor pointed me to a beautiful lake on the left in the distance at the foot of the mountain, on whose clear, placid bosom ducks seemed to be swiming and trees casting shadows in the water, little canoes gliding silently, and shaped creatures ducking and diving in quest of food, very pretty to contemplate over the hot, dry sand, but 'twas all in seeming, for this was all a mirage. Nothing but dry, burning sand in the distance. I had been watching to be surprised by a mirage, but this one was not as beautiful as my imagination had pictured; but my mind picturing was at fault, for this was an unusually fine mirage. About noon we found ourselves rolling on between the ranges of mountains, San Bernardino on the right, San Jacinto on the left. I am told that the peak of San Jacinto is 7,800 feet above the level of the sea and covered with perpetual snow, which makes it glisten in the sunlight, and the weeds which I called attention to, looking to me only a few inches high, are large evergreen trees measuring in some instances more than one hundred and fifty feet in height. This mountain looked to me scarcely higher than the dome to our court-house, and the base not a stone's throw distant. I was told I would measure five miles before touching its foot. How very deceitful the clear air is. Gradually vegetation appeared, and the valley assumed something of beauty a half hour before reaching Colton, where we stop for dinner. Some three or four miles away in the valley close to the foot hills is San Bernardino, a very thrifty settlement of fruit-growers. The colony was started by Mormons, I think, though they are not poligamists. Some say this is a very delightful place, others say they would not live there for the best home to be found in the place. Hearing many and almost universal praise of Los Angeles, I stopped off to look the city and adjoining country over. My first impressions of the town were unpleasant, but my hotel, the Pico House, looks out upon the old Spanish fort where are old rickety adobe houses. But when I went up on the hill and looked over the city and some of the valley, I thought it a pretty sight. As I looked through the streets, I was charmed with the profligate profusion of nicely tinted flowers, the tropical trees and fruits. Just imagine, if you can, hedges of fish geraniums almost a scarlet mass, with bloom too bright for my eyes to gaze upon, fencing in the yard. Fuchsias grown into shrubs so high I must look up to see their pendant blossoms. Rose-geraniums of mammoth size standing like weeds by the roadside, abundant with flowers, which were not very pretty, and cactuses of many varieties. Century plants, some in bloom. I saw hedges of cactus (of the kind I learned years ago to call picklepear) grown as high as a house roof, the trunk of the tree hardened into the hardest wood, yet retaining much the shape of the large picklypear leaf. The large leaves supporting thorns several inches in length, and many minor prickers you find if you dare to touch them. Each pear, or leaf, has a flower on the end, but I did not think the cactus pretty, only very remarkable to my eyes. From Los Angeles I rode out into the country visting orange and lemon orchards, or groves, as they call them. On one drive I saw the dwarfed oaks, native to the valley, the rubber tree, Norfolk pine, pine-apple in blossom, cypress tree, which is much needed here for hedge, as is also the pomegranate; the suava, from whose fruit jelly is made; the olive, two or three varieties of palm trees; pepper, English walnut, eucalyptus, banana, lemon, lime, orange and magnolia trees in flower. The arbutulion, which I think is the same as the arbutus, and a great many flowering shrubs I did not learn the names of, and many strange flowering plants to me. Saw tomato vines (they seemed quite like trees) that I was told by the proprietors he had picked tomatoes from them each day for three successive years. The valleys are very fertile and productive where man irrigates, but when in their native wildness, very little vegetation is seen. The dwellings in Los Angeles are nearly all built of wood, and some of them are very pretty, but if anything grows in the yard it must be thoroughly watered, for they say it never rains from April or May until December. I was not so well pleased with Los Angeles as I expected to be, so many had been lavish in its praise, but my stay there was cut short by illness, and I left on the cars for San Jose, Wednesday evening, June 22, with a severe headache and a good deal of fever. I think the immediate abuse a walk of several miles to see the city at mid day under a clear hot sun, but the air war so invigorating or the excitement so agreeable of seeing the outside surroundings of Los Angeles homes, I forgot to note evidences of fatigue, till my physical nature was quite exhausted, and I was obliged to suffer for my folly.

B. HORTENSE T. HALE.

The President.

We take the following beautiful sentiment entire, from the Indianapolis Sentinel of last Thursday. It is the most sensible article we have seen on this melancholy subject:—"President Garfield is credited with being a religious man. For many weary days he has communed with his own soul. To him, the world has been shut out; his voice has been hushed to silence for fear that the effort of speech might in some way help to snap the cord that holds him to earth and friends. The doctors have recorded the pulse-beats of his heart, but none but himself and his God know the pulse-beats of his soul. The' clouds have gathered on the mountain-tops of earthly ambition. Office, honor, power, fame, have each passed in review; have each occupied his thoughts, but who shall say they have disturbed the serenity of his soul? It is better to believe that the hours so sad and weary to the watchers, so full of anguish to weeping wife and children, have been to the sufferer hours of triumph, when simple faith, laying hold upon the promises of the Master, have lifted him to communion with heaven, and that these hours, after all, have been the happiest of his checkered life. The president has not lived to see the twilight of a weary life. At high noon his sun was eclipsed in the midst of plans of pleasure and ambition. The film of death fell upon his eyes and a hazy gloom settled around him. But the reaction came, his great intellect retained its seat, and in its silent operation the problem of life has passed in review. He has looked upon it in all its manifold phases with the calmness becoming a christian philosopher, and has said: "I am not afraid to die." That tells the story, and with it the testimony is complete, and the world may sit silent while life and death struggle for the mastery, knowing whatever may be the issue the sufferer is prepared."

Justice Clifford.

DEATH OF THE VENERABLE STATESMAN AND JURIST—A SKETCH OF HIS BRILLIANT CAREER.

"Justice Nathan Clifford was born at Romney, Grafton county, N. H. He received a high school and academy education, and began the study of the law. After his admission to the Bar he removed to Maine, where he has since resided. From 1830 to 1834 he was a member of the legislature, acting as speaker a portion of the time. From 1834 to 1838 he was Attorney-general of Maine, and from 1838 to 1846 was a representative in congress. He served as Attorney-general of the United States from October, 1846 to June, 1848. He was appointed a commissioner to Mexico in 1847, and afterward made Minister to that country. After a public service of a score of years he retired to private life, and commenced the practice of his profession at Portland. He was recalled from his retirement by President Buchanan in 1858, and appointed a justice of the Supreme court, which position he has ever since occupied, although he has been incapacitated from the performance of his duties since last October. In that month he was stricken with paralysis while on his way to Washington from his home, and was confined to his residence in that city until his return to his home last spring. Only a few weeks ago his foot was amputated on account of gangrene having set in, and that operation probably hastened his death. Judge Clifford was a democrat, and has acted with that party during his entire life. He was an honest and upright judge, and his opinions were always recognized as sound law. During his service on the bench he compiled several volumes of reports containing the decisions rendered by him in his circuit. He decided uniformly against Federal election laws, legal tender laws and all other legislation which encroached, according to the Jeffersonian idea, upon the rights of the states, or asserted rights not granted to either the state or the general government. He was a member and president of the Electoral Commission of 1877."

[Detroit Chaff.]

We hear a great deal about rings nowadays, and nothing very good of them either. I heard of a ring the other day that told a story—in fact, its own story. The ring glistened on the finger of a washwoman through the suds in a tub, and thus betrayed a secret. The lady of a certain house in this city had advertised for a laundress to come to her house on certain days. The advertisement was responded to by a neat, rather refined-looking woman. When the laundress had began her work, the lady saw, shining on a shapely hand, a pretty and peculiar ring. She requested the privilege of looking at it. The woman hesitated a moment, and then nervously held out her hand.

"That is a class ring," said the lady.

"It is," was the response of the laundress as she turned her face away.

"Where did you get it?" asked the lady, emboldened, perhaps, by the manner of the wearer of the ring.

"It is my husband's."

"At what college did he graduate?"

"At Yale."

"In what class?"

"The class of '75."

That ended the interview for the time, as the lady could by no means get from the washwoman the name of her husband. The lady had been thus unladylike, perhaps, and curious because her son wore a class ring exactly like the one in question, and was a graduate in the class of '75 at Yale. She told him the story, and one night he followed the laundress to her room, in Michigan avenue, where he found an old classmate and college chum poring over some second-hand law books. He works in the daytime, and so does his trump of a wife. One day he will be admitted to the bar, he will work hard, she will help him, and when they are rich they can afford to smile at the story of the ring—which is strictly true.

Complicated Diseases.

A prominent gentleman in Cerro Gordo county, Iowa, writes us that he finds Kidney-Wort to be the best remedy he ever knew for the complication of diseases. It is the specific action which it has on the liver, kidney and bowels, which gives it such curative power, and it is the thousands of cures which it is performing which gives it its great celebrity. Liquid, (very concentrated) or dry—both act efficiently. —N. H. Journal and Courier.

Valuable Book Given Away.

"Pleasure Resorts of St. Louis and Vicinity," is the title of a handsomely illustrated little volume, just issued by the principal railroads centering in St. Louis. As the name indicates, it contains a description of the public gardens, pleasure resorts and picnic grounds in St. Louis, and those located on the railroads adjacent to the city. In addition to this, and that which makes the work especially valuable, is the fact that all of the noted mineral springs, located in the southwest, are fully described. Location, best mode of access, and the special medicinal virtues of the waters are clearly defined, and much important information given in regard to these health-giving resorts not heretofore published. The wonderful Excelsior Springs of western Missouri, in Clay county, near Kansas City, the waters of which have effected many of the most remarkable cures in this century, are among the places described. This valuable reference book will be mailed free to all by sending address to Making Watches.

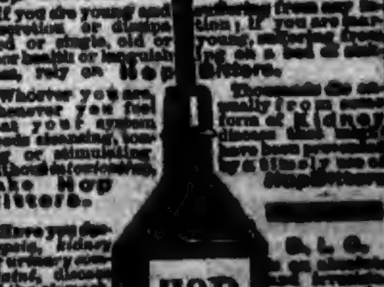
Defective Watch Cases are one of the chief causes of so many watches not being good time pieces. The cases being thin and not fitting well, admit dust and dirt to the movement, which soon interferes with the running parts of the watch, necessitating cleaning, repairing, etc., and the amount thus paid out, if applied toward buying a good case in the beginning, would have saved all this trouble and expense. We have recently seen a case that meets all these requirements, it having been carried for over twenty years and still remains perfect. We refer to the JAS. BOSS' PATENT STIFFENED GOLD CASE, which has become one of the staple articles of the Jewelery trade, possessing as it does, so many advantages over all other watch cases, being made of two heavy plates of solid gold over a plate of composition, and we advise all our readers to ask their Jeweler for a card or catalogue that will explain the manner in which they are made.

It is the only STIFFENED CASE made with two plates of gold, seamless pendants, and center, solid joints, crown pieces, etc., all of which are covered by letters patent. Therefore buy no case before consulting a Jeweler who keeps the JAS. BOSS' PATENT STIFFENED GOLD CASE, that you may learn the difference between it and all imitations that claim to be equally as good.

For sale by Albright the Jeweler. Ask to see the warrant that accompanies each case, and don't be persuaded that any other make of case is as good.



MY AUNT HANNAH.

I've an oldish maiden aunt,
Who is growing gray and gaunt,
Now-a-days;
Why, I've never told her yet—
Never can—I'm her pet,
So she says.

Everybody loves my aunt;
Saying somehow, what I can't,
In her praise;
Though I love her just as well,
And quite innocently tell
Her queer ways:

My aunt Hannah blushes yet,
And gets straightway in a pet,
Or a rage,
If her youth you dare debate,
Or doubt insinuate
Of her age.

While the "men folk" sleep at morn,
Heeding never bell or horn,
At our doors;
Lo! she slumbereth not, nor sleepeth,
But she riseth up and sweepeth
All the floors.

Dusteth she my own snug study,
Asketh Susan, "Weren't it muddy
Late o' nights?"
As she sweepeth aye she sings,
And perennially putteth things
"All to rights."

My aunt Hannah wears a cap;
Such another you, mayhap,
May have seen;
If you know one Mrs. Farnham,
Or it, haply, o'er at Barnum's
You have been.

Well, her autumn groweth dreary,
She goeth sad and weary,
To her grave;
Home she leaves, to those who knew her:
Nobler, gentler, kinder, truer,
Or more brave.

THE COFFEE-POT.

A Story From the French, by Theophile Gautier.

Last year I was invited, with two of my studio companions, Arrigo Cohic and Pedrino Borgnioli, to pass a few days at a country house in the heart of Normandy. The weather, which at the time of our departure promised to be superb, changed suddenly, and so much rain fell that the roads which we passed were like the bed of a torrent. We sank in the mud up to our knees, the soles of our boots were clogged with a thick coating of clayey mud, the weight of which retarded our steps so much that we did not arrive at our destination until an hour after sunset.

We were harassed, and so our host, seeing the efforts that we had to make in order to repress our yawns and to keep our eyes open, had us shown each to our chamber as soon as supper was over.

My chamber was vast; I felt, as I entered it, as it were, a shudder of fever, for it seemed to me that I was entering a new world. Indeed, you might have believed yourself in the days of the Regency, to see above the panels by Boucher, representing the four seasons, the furniture overloaded with rocaille ornaments in the worst taste, and the heavily carved looking-glass frames. Nothing had been disturbed. The toilet table, covered with combs, brushes and powder-boxes, seemed to have been in use an hour ago. Two or three dresses of changing colors, a fan covered with silver spangles, lay carelessly on the polished oak floor, and to my great astonishment a tortoise-shell snuff-box, open on the chimney-piece, was full of fresh tobacco.

I did not notice these things until the servant, after placing the candlestick on the table, had wished me good night, and I confess, I began to tremble like a leaf. I undressed myself promptly, went to bed, and in order to have done with my foolish fears, I soon closed my eyes and turned my face toward the wall. But it was impossible for me to remain in this position; the bed began to move beneath me like a wave, my eyelids were drawn violently back. I was obliged to turn and see.

The blazing fire cast a red reflection in the apartment, so that the figures of the tapestry, and of the smoky portraits that hung on the walls, could be easily distinguished. They were the ancestors of our host, chevaliers swathed in iron, councilors in periwigs, and fair ladies with painted faces and white-powdered hair, holding a rose in their hand.

Suddenly, the fire became strangely active, a bleared light illuminated the chamber, and I saw clearly what I had taken for vain paintings, was a reality, for the eyes of the framed beings began to move and to sparkle in a strange manner, their lips opened and closed like the lips of people speaking, but I heard nothing but the ticktick of the clock and the whistling of the autumn wind. An insuperable terror seized me, my hair stood on end, my teeth chattered, my body was bathed in a cold sweat.

The clock struck eleven. The vibration of the last stroke sang long in the air, and when it died away entire * * * Oh! no! I dare not say what happened; no one would believe me. I should be taken for a madman. The candles lighted of themselves; the bellows, without any visible being touching them, began to blow the fire, rattling like an asthmatic old man, while the tongs stirred the billets of wood and the shovel gathered up the ashes. Then a coffee-pot bounded from the table on which it had been placed, and went hobbing along toward the fire-brands. A few minutes afterward the arm-chairs began to move, and, agitating their twisted feet in a surprising manner, came and ranged themselves around the fire.

I did not know what to think of what I saw, but what remained for to see was still more extraordinary.

One of the portraits—the oldest of all, that of a fat, chubby, gray-bearded man, resembling remarkably the idea I had formed to myself of Sir John Falstaff, pushed his head out of the frame with a grimace, and after having, with great effort, forced his shoulders and his fair, round belly between the narrow gilded border, he jumped down heavily.

He had no sooner taken breath than he drew from the pocket of his doublet a wonderfully small key; he blew on it to see that the hole was clear, and then applied it to all the frames, one after the other; and all the frames became enlarged, so as to allow the figures which they contained to pass through with ease. Little, doll-like babies, dry and yellow dowagers, grave magistrates buried in large black robes, petits maitres in silk stockings and prunello breeches—all these personages presented such an old spectacle that in spite of my fright I could not help laughing. These worthy folks sat down; the coffee-pot bounded lightly on the table. They took coffee in cups of blue and white Japanese porcelain, which sprang up spontaneously from the top of a secretary; each one provided with a lump of sugar and a little silver spoon.

When the coffee had been taken, coffee-pot, cups and spoons disappeared all at once, and conversation began. Sooth to say, it was the most curious conversation that I have ever heard, for none of those strange talkers looked at the other while he spoke; they all had their eyes fixed upon the clock. At last midnight struck; a voice, the tone of which was identical with that of the bell of the clock, was heard saying:

"This is the hour; we must dance."

All the assembly rose. Tilt arm-chairs drew back of their own accord; then each cavalier took the hand of a lady, and the same voice said:

"Come, gentlemen of the orchestra, begin."

I forgot to say that the subjects of the tapestry were, on one side, an Italian concert, and on the other a stag-hunt with huntsmen, and the musicians, who, until then, had not made any gestures, bowed the head in token of adhesion. The maestro raised his wand and lively dance music sounded from one end of the room. The first dance was a minuet. But the rapid notes of the score harmonized badly with those grave courtesies, and so after a few minutes each of the couple began to pirouette like a Dutch top. The silk dresses of the women, crumpled in the giddy maze of the dance, gave forth an odd sound, like the sound of whirring pigeons' wings. The wind filling them from beneath puffed them out so that they looked like swinging bells.

The bows of the fiddlers passed so rapidly over the strings that electric sparks flew out. The fingers of the flute players moved up and down like quicksilver; the cheeks of the huntsman were swollen out like balloons, and all that formed a deluge of notes and rills so hurried and of ascending and descending gamut so complicated, so inconceivable, that the very demons could not have followed such a measure for two minutes. It was pitiful to see all the efforts of those dancers to catch the tune. They bounded and whirled round and pirouetted until the sweat poured down their foreheads over their eyes, and carried away their pain and patches. But it was all in vain, the orchestra was always three or four notes in advance.

The clock struck one; they stopped. I then saw something which had escaped my notice—a woman who was not dancing. She was seated on a low chair in the chimney corner and did not seem to take the least part in the world in what was going on around her.

Never, even in a dream, had anything so perfect presented itself to my eyes; a skin of dazzling brightness, hair blonde cendre, long eyelashes, and blue eyes, so clear and transparent that I saw her soul through them as distinctly as a stone in a brook. And I felt that if ever I came to love anybody it would be her. I jumped out of bed, from which I had not yet dared to stir, and went toward her, conducted by some instinct in me which I could not explain. I found myself at her knees, one of her hands in mine, talking with her as if I had known her for twenty years.

But a strange prodigy, while speaking to her, I marked the music with a movement of my head. It had not ceased to play, and, although it was for me the height of happiness to talk with such a beautiful woman, my feet were burning to dance with her. Still, I did not dare to make the proposition. It seems she understood what I wanted, for, raising her hand toward the dial of the clock, she said:

"When the needle shall be there, we will see, my dear Theodore."

I know not how it happened, but I was in no way surprised to hear myself called by my name, and we continued to talk. At last, when the appointed hour struck, the silvery voice vibrated once more in the chamber, and said:

"Angela, you may dance with the gentleman, if you please; but you know what will be the result."

"No matter," replied Angela, in a pouting tone.

She passed her ivory arm around my neck.

"Prestissimo!" cried the voice.

And we began to waltz. The bosom of the young girl touched mine, her velvet cheek skimmed my own. Never in my life had I experienced such emotion; my nerves quivered like springs of steel, my blood flowed in my veins like torrents of lava, and I heard my heart beat as if a watch were ticking in my ear. Still this state had nothing painful in it. I was in a flood of ineffable joy and I could have wished to have remained always as I was, and remarkably enough, although the orchestra had tripled its quickness, we needed no effort to follow it.

The bystanders, astonished at our agility, cried bravo, and clapped their hands with all their might without producing any noise.

Angela, who until then had waltzed with surprising energy and precision, seemed suddenly to become fatigued; she hung on my shoulders as if her limbs had failed her; her little feet, which a minute ago had hardly touched the floor, rose slowly as if they had been weighted with lead.

"Angela, you are weary," I said to her; "let us rest."

"Yes," she replied, wiping her brow with her handkerchief; "but while we have been dancing they have all sat down; there is only one chair, and we are two."

"What does that matter, my angel? I will take you on my knees."

Without making the slightest objection, Angela sat down, threw her arms like a white scarf round my neck, and hid her head in my bosom to warm herself a little, for she had become cold as marble.

I know not how long we remained in that position, for my senses were all absorbed in the contemplation of this mysterious and fantastic creature. I had no longer any idea of time or place; the real world no longer existed for me, and all the bonds which bound me to it were broken, my soul, disengaged from its earthly prison, was floating in vague infinity. I understood that which no man can understand; the thoughts of Angela were revealed to me without her needing to speak, for her soul shone through her body like a lamp of alabaster, and the rays from her breast pierced mine.

As soon as Angela saw it, she rose precipitately, made a sign of farewell, and after a few steps, she screamed and fell.

Seized with terror, I sprang forward. My blood freezes at the thought; I found nothing but the coffee-pot broken into a thousand fragments.

At the sight of this, persuaded that I had been the sport of some diabolic delusion, I was so overpowered with fright that I fainted.

When I became conscious again I was in my bed; Arrigo Cohic and Pedrino Borgnioli were standing at the head. As soon as I opened my eyes, Arrigo cried:

"Ah! at last! For the last hour I have been rubbing your temples with eau de Cologne. What on earth have you been doing in the night? This morning, seeing that you did not come down, I entered your room and found you stretched full length upon the floor, dressed in an old Louis XVI. costume, and pressing in your arms a fragment of broken porcelian, as if it had been a beautiful young lady."

"Pardieu! it is grandfather's wedding coat," said the other, lifting up one of the tails of the rose-colored silk with a green figure. "There are the strass and filigree buttons that he used to boast about. Theodore must have found it in the corner, and have put it on for fun. But what made you faint?" added Borgnioli.

"That is all very well for young girls with white shoulders; you unlace her corsets, take off her necklace, and it is a good opportunity for them to simper and give themselves airs."

"It is only weakness," I replied dryly; I am subject to these fits."

I rose and divested myself of my ridiculous costume.

At breakfast my three companions ate heartily; I hardly tasted anything. The memory of what had passed distracted me.

After breakfast, as it was raining steadily, there was no possibility of going out; each occupied himself as best he could. Borgnioli beat a warlike devil's tatoo on the window-panes; Arrigo and our host played draughts; I took out my sketch book and began to draw.

The almost imperceptible lineaments traced by my pencil, without my having thought in the least what I was drawing, resembled with marvelous exactitude the coffee-pot which had played such an important role in the scenes of the night.

"It is astonishing how that head resembles my sister Angela," said our host, who had finished his game and was watching me draw.

Indeed, that which just now had seemed to be a coffee-pot was in reality the sweet and melancholy profile of Angela.

"By all the saints in Paradise! Is she dead or alive?" I cried in a trembling voice, as if my life depended on his answer.

"She died two years ago from inflammation of the lungs, caught coming home from a ball."

"Alas!" I replied, painfully.

And, restraining a tear that was ready to fall, I closed my sketch book. I felt that there was no longer any happiness on earth for me.

The Spider as a Balloonist.

In speaking of the intelligence displayed by birds and beasts, Seth Green argued strongly in favor of the reasoning power of insects especially, and related from his own experience the manner in which a spider constructs a balloon. If you anchor a pole in a body of water leaving the pole above the surface, and put a spider upon it, he will exhibit marvelous intelligence by his plans to escape. At first, he will spin a web several inches long and hang to one end while he allows the other to float off in the wind, in the hope that it will strike some object. Of course this plan proves a failure, but the spider is not discouraged. He waits until the wind changes, and then sends another silken bridge floating off in another direction. Another failure is followed by several other similar attempts, until all the points of the compass have been tried. But neither the resources nor the reasoning power of the spider is exhausted. He climbs to the top of the pole and energetically goes to work to construct a silken balloon. He has no hot air with which to inflate it, but he has the power of making it buoyant. When he gets his balloon finished he does not go off upon the mere supposition that it will carry him, as men often do, but he fastens to it a guy rope, the other end of which he attaches to the island pole upon which he is a prisoner. He then gets into his ærial vehicle, while it is made fast, and test it to see whether its dimensions are capable of the work of bearing him away. He often finds that he has made it too small, in which case he hauls it down, takes it all apart, and constructs it on a larger and better plan. A spider has been seen to make three different balloons before he became satisfied with his experiment. Then he will get in, snap the guy-rope, and sail away to land as gracefully and as supremely independent of his surroundings as could well be imagined. Mr. Green stated that he had repeatedly witnessed such actions by spiders, and that he feels convinced that it is reason that enabled them to free themselves from their prison.—Rochester Democrat.

Air Your Beds.

Be sure to let the fresh air, and, if possible, the sun have free access to it an hour or more before making up. Have the sheet long enough to turn under the mattress at the foot, the lower one the same at the head, but fold the upper sheet well over the bedding. This will save the quilts from becoming soiled by the sleeper's breath. When a bed has been occupied all winter, everything about it should be washed in the spring. To wash a feather-tick, choose fair weather so that you can dry it out-door. Crowd the feathers into one end of the tick and tie firmly in the center. Wash the empty end and when dry shake the feathers into that, tie again and wash the other half. Corn-husk beds are much nicer than straw, as they are not so dusty, and with the addition of a few fresh husks from time to time, will last for years. They may be freshed by turning the husks out in the sun and air for a day or two and sifting out the fine stuff. In winter never keep sheets on a bed that is seldom used. They will gather dampness and render themselves very uncomfortable, perhaps fatal, to your guest. Make up the bed without the sheets and add them when needed.

SCRAPS OF SCIENCE.

Herr Thomholy thinks he can trace a connection between the frequency of displays of aurora and the phases of the moon.

Dr. Ridoux maintains that while Spaniards, Italians and French can be acclimatized in Algeria, people from the North of Europe cannot. This result, if well established, may have a very important bearing upon the colonization of Africa in the near future.

Mr. Wigner, in the Analyst states that American corned-beef is twice as valuable, as an article of diet, as fresh boneless beef, and that the cooked ox tongues contain less salt and more nutritive matter than the dried tongues usually sold in European markets.

M. Grehant proved in recent experiments that the quantity of carbonic acid exhaled by any one individual of an animal species varies but little. Irritations and inflammations of the respiratory mucous membrane decrease the exhalation of carbonic acid, which then tends to accumulate in the blood.

Mr. W. H. Preece, the English electrician, has determined with much accuracy the area protected by a properly adjusted lightning-rod. His conclusion is that the protection extends to a conic space whose height is the length of the rod, the base being a circle having its radius equal to the height of the rod—an opinion which has been held by scientific men for a long time.

Considerable changes in the water-level of several lakes in California and Oregon are reported. It is stated that Goose Lake, thirty miles long, was nearly dry in 1853 and 1854, but contained ten feet of water in 1870, and its depth has since been increasing. Clear Lake is also ten feet deeper than in 1854, while Tulie Lake, in the same region, is now ten or fifteen feet higher than then.

Though the invention of the barometer is due to the mathematician Torricelli, yet in England Sir Christopher Wren was the first to suggest that the varying weight of the atmosphere was the true cause of the variation in the height of the mercury. This was a theory opposed to that of the disciples of Descartes, who ascribed the variation to the influence of the moon.

Nearly every year there falls in some part of the world a greater or less quantity of fine yellow powder, which fall is popularly believed to be a shower of sulphur. Investigation, however, shows the powder to be the fine pollen of a species of pine tree. The pollen grains float easily in the air, and are often carried by gales a thousand miles. When they fall on snow the effect is often startling.

For preserving the natural colors of dried flowers and plants, this process has been recommended by German scientists: Dissolve one part of salicylic acid in 600 parts of alcohol, heat the solution to boiling in a shallow dish, and draw the plant through it slowly; shake off any excess of liquid, dry between blotting paper, and press in the usual manner. Natural colors are said to be thus preserved in greater perfection than by other processes.

It is believed that porosity is a property of all bodies. An experiment performed some years ago, to ascertain whether water could be compressed, resulted in proving that gold is porous—the water inclosed in a hollow sphere of gold and forced by the violent pressure applied passed through the sphere and appeared on the outside. The pores through which the liquid was driven could not have been more than the two-millionth of an inch in diameter.

A certain Count Hugo von Engenberg, of Fratzberg in the Tyrol, is making use of microphones—sunk in the ground on a declivity of a hill, and connected separately with a single telephone and small battery—to discover a source of water for his castle. He intends to conduct the experiment by night, when disturbing sounds and vibrations of the ground are less frequent than by day. If a stream of water flows near the apparatus it will pass the sound to the telephone, and thus reveal the spring.

Origin of Life Insurance.

The rise of life insurance may be traced to several sources. The doctrine of probabilities developed by Pascal and Huggens, as to games of chance, was applied to life contingencies by the great Dutch statesman, Jan DeWitt, in 1671, but it was not till some time after that it was applied to life insurance. In 1698 there was a hint at modern life insurance in a London organization, and this was followed by another association two years after. The operations of these two seem to have passed away without giving to their successors any clear nature of their plan of operations. A third, the Amicable Society for a Perpetual Assurance Office, was founded at London in 1706. It was mutual; that is, each member, without reference to age, paid a fixed admission fee, and a fixed annual payment per share on from one to three shares; at the end of the year a portion of the fund was divided among the heirs of the deceased members in proportion to the shares held by each. There grew up with this the election of members, in after years, then the limitations as to age, occupation, health, and other suggestions which were finally developed by other organizations upon scientific principles.

Manners in Public Conveyances.

Many a long day on the railroad or steamer may be brightened in memory through the goodness shown by some transient traveling acquaintances. Boorishness, rudeness and brusqueness affect us, if our neighbors manifest them, and arouse an instinctive antagonism which is far from agreeable as an incident of consciousness. Who can not recall, among the disagreeable associations of some past summer, the family of ill-governed children who quarreled, squalled and squabbled through miles of beautiful scenery which they made it difficult to enjoy? Or the family who ate their way through a summer day, the fare being mostly peanuts, gingerbread and hard-boiled eggs, while the stickiness and mingled fragrance of the food, clinging to begrimed faces and hands, were very repellant to the sensitive, who were obliged to see and smell? The loud, argumentative talkers, who insist on taking a carful of people into their confidence as they discuss politics, and the chattering school-girls whose effervescence of spirits and unchecked merriment know no bounds, are alike transgressors against good manners. A public conveyance is not a private parlor, and, that many may enjoy it, the individual should study the manifest rules of common sense and the unwritten code of gentle and thoughtful love. The gentleman, the gentle-woman, and their children, need no introduction beyond what they bear in their quiet, pleasant countenances and carriage in a public place.

Antiquity of the Earth.

Theologians of every sect and creed had persistently taught that only some 6,000 years had elapsed since the earth sprang into being. The suggestion of its greater antiquity was received with a storm of theological opposition, which underwent little abatement during half a century, and of which even yet the ground-swell may occasionally be felt in some of the dark recesses of ignorant minds. The majority of those who raised the storm were the social or professional ancestors of those who now, in like manner, oppose the doctrine of evolution; but the change which has come over the latter races of combatants is itself some proof evolution affects the minds of men, whatever it may do to their bodies. Fifty years ago the full force of an anathematizing odium theologicum burst upon the heads of the assailed geologists, with a violence happily unknown among the opponents of evolution. Then, as now, the representatives of geological science explained to the world the great facts upon which their conclusions were based. Then, as now, myriads of men were in doubt whether to resign themselves to the leadership of geologists or of the theologians. But those who ranged themselves under the banner of Cuvier, Lyell and Sedgwick ultimately found themselves on the victorious side. One by one the theologians laid down their vituperative weapons. The late Dr. Chalmers early accepted the geological creed, Dr. Pye Smith received the fellowship of the Royal Society for his well-meant endeavor to reconcile the Mosaic narrative with the writings of the geologists, earning some hard names from the defenders of the orthodox camp for his supposed abandonment of their holy cause. Meanwhile, the geological batteries made sad breaches in the defenses of that camp. A late Dean of York valiantly confronted the assailing hosts when assembled in his cathedral city. Singly he faced his foes like a new Horatius, but speedily fell beneath the sharp arrows of Sedgwick's biting eloquence. The last Hypatian geologist who strove to restore the dying faith was Young, the clerical author of the "Geological Survey of the Yorkshire Coast." He, like the Dean, lifted up his warning voice in a geological section of the British Association for the Advancement of Science, but in vain. Even a Julian could not have restored the ancient belief, and Young was not a Julian. Truth proved too much for error; and, though occasionally a theologian may still be found so ignorant of what is going on around him as to uphold the exploded doctrine, the race has almost become extinct.—Contemporary Review.

How Grasshoppers Propagate.

A Truckee Meadows ranchman, who has been studying the ways of the grasshopper for the past two years, says they have a touch of intelligence in them that must come from the devil. Among many things he tells about the hoppers in proof of their being endowed with fiendish smartness, his description of the manner in which the eggs of the female are planted in the ground is not the least curious. He says when the time for depositing the eggs arrives the hoppers select a patch of ground that is somewhat soft, yet of firm texture. Here collect swarms of both males and females. The males set to work and bore a hole in the ground to the depth of about an inch, carefully smoothing the sides and rounding it. Five or six of them then seize upon a female and stand her on end in this hole, waist deep. They then carefully tamp in fine dirt all about the lower part of her body, and thus securely fasten her in the ground from the waist up. When this operation is completed it is impossible for the female hopper to release herself; indeed, our grasshopperologist says he has often tried to pull them out when so planted, and always found that they would pull in two, leaving the abdominal region (greatly distended with eggs) sticking fast in the ground. Once the female has rid herself of her load of eggs she can get out of the ground without the least difficulty.

Our ranchman philosopher says that on withdrawing herself from the hole in which she has deposited her eggs the female seals up the top of it with saliva and dirt. In a short time this dries and the clay becomes as hard as cement. On digging out one of these cells after it has had time to dry it is found to be a sort of tube closely sealed at both ends and able to withstand both moisture and cold.

The male hoppers that dig the hole in which the eggs are to be deposited evidently deposit in it the viscous matter that is to form the lower part of the egg case, leaving to the female the task of closing it up as her part of the work.

It is only a patch of ground here and there that seems to fill all the conditions required by the hoppers in their egg-planting business. On these they swarm, and may be seen industriously at work on almost every square inch of ground, all the males at work like beavers at digging holes, boosting up and planting the egg-layers.—*Virginia (Nev.) The "Devil" in American Geography.

The number of lakes, slides, ovens, gates, bridges, towers, bluffs, falls, kitchens, creeks, etc., that have had the word "devil" attached to them is simply immense. From the forests of Maine to the adobe villages on the Mexican border and the Dalles of the Columbia, there is hardly a locality that has not remembered his Satanic majesty. The best known Devil's Gate, on the line of the Union Pacific Railroad, is that a few stations east of Ogden, and in Utah. It is a wild, picturesque spot, and one worth a visit of the tourist. There are a good many Devil's Gates, and, no doubt, in the christening of the Sweetwater, the miners found it convenient to give the ubiquitous party a way out of that country.—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

It serves every purpose where a Tonic is necessary.

Manufactured by The Dr. Harter Medicine Co., St. Louis.

Gentlemen:—Some three months ago I began the use of Dr. Harter's Iron Tonic, upon the advice of many friends who knew its virtues. I was suffering from general debility to such an extent that my labor was exceedingly burdensome to me. A vacation of a month did not give me much relief, but on the contrary, was followed by increased prostration and sinking chills. At this time I began the use of your Iron Tonic, from which I realized almost immediate and wonderful results. The old energy returned and I found that my natural force was not permanently abated. I have used three bottles of the Tonic. Since using it I have done twice the labor that I ever did in the same time during my illness, and with double the ease. With the tranquil nerve and vigor of body, has come also a clearness of thought never before enjoyed. If the Tonic has not done the work, I know not what. I give it the credit.

Most gratefully yours,

WEBSTER.

A Reminiscence of the Great Statesman.

[Richard B. Kimball, in The Dartmouth.]

Shortly after Fenimore Cooper's death there was a meeting of literary men in the city of New York, in the Governor's room at the City Hall. Washington Irving presided. A committee was appointed to make arrangements for a suitable recognition of the event, and further to raise funds for the erection of a monument to the memory of the deceased n velist.

At our first meeting Mr. Bryant was elected to deliver the eulogy, and his acceptance was speedily obtained. After various propositions, Dr. Rufus Griswold, who was the leading spirit throughout, suggested that we should, if possible, get Mr. Webster to preside on the occasion. Mr. Webster was soon to pass through New York on his way to Washington, and I availed myself of the circumstance to see him personally on the subject. I called on him at the Astor House and stated my errand. He seemed somewhat taken back at the proposition, and asked me if I thought it would be quite appropriate.

"I am not a literary man," he said. "It seems to me you should select one for this office."

"Mr. Webster," I replied, "we certainly claim you as such. You will be judged by your printed works, and printed works constitute literature."

He considered a moment and then said: "I have engaged to deliver a discourse before your Historical Society the last week in February. If you can arrange your meeting about the same time I will preside at it."

At the appointed hour I drove to the Astor House for Mr. Webster and brought him to the hall. On the way he repeated twice to himself:

The applause of listening Senates to command.

Turning suddenly to me he exclaimed: "Youngster, what is the line immediately succeeding that?"

The question came so unexpectedly that I could not answer it. We happened to be just opposite Randolph's book store. Stopping the carriage, I jumped out and procured a copy of "Gray's Elegy," came back and read the lines Mr. Webster wished for, and we proceeded on our way.

An amusing incident occurred at the opening. Mr. Irving, whose duty it was as Chairman of our committee to announce Mr. Webster, came forward in his shy, frightened manner, to go through with his task, when some one seated exactly in front of him among the audience rose, and, before Mr. Irving could get out a word, shouted at the top of his voice: "Three cheers for the author of the 'Sketch Book.'" Three cheers were given to Mr. Irving's utter dismay and discomfiture. He stammered out Mr. Webster's name and some inarticulate words about "presiding," then, quickly retreating, he seated himself quite away from observation.

Mr. Webster's opening remarks, the eulogy of Mr. Bryant, the brilliant speeches which followed, and Mr. Webster's closing sentences were carefully reported in the daily journals. I observed that he used the quotations from "Grey's Elegy" while speaking, showing that his mind was occupied with the subject as we rode along.

The assembly broke up at a late hour. I had engaged to bring Mr. Webster to the Century Club after we had concluded, where a handsome collation had been prepared. The club-rooms, at that time, were near by in Broadway. We found a large gathering already assembled, and after a long address of welcome by the venerable Chief Justice of the Superior Court, Samuel Jones, general introductions followed. Mr. Webster remained all the time standing near the head of the table. After some pleasant observations, he remarked that he perceived there were several artists in the company.

"Perhaps, gentlemen, you are not aware," he said, "that many years ago we had in this country two famous pictures by Vandyke," naming them.

At this announcement some of the artists exchanged glances with each other, as much as to say, "He is out of his reckoning this time."

"The circumstances were these," continued Mr. Webster. "There was a wealthy Hollander who, shortly after the beginning of the present century, came to America and took up his residence about fourteen miles from Washington. He was the owner of the two pictures I have mentioned. A portion of his family remained in Holland. At his death, in dividing his property, he left to a daughter in New York these two paintings, or a certain number of guilders, as she should elect. Now, gentlemen," continued Mr. Webster, with an air of intense disgust, "this lady's husband was in trade, and he took the guilders, and the paintings were packed up and sent back to Holland. I was in Congress at the time, and went with a friend to see them before they were carried away."

Killed by Fashion.

A writer in the Sanitarian says that a late prominent physician of Paris estimated that 3,000 children had died in that city, during the thirty years of his practice there, from short sleeves, short pants, and other kindred imprudences in the dressing of children. And I am fully convinced that as large a proportion are sacrificed in towns, at least, in this country, from the same cause—all for a wicked fashion. And from careful observation, in this country and abroad, I am confident that at least as many are carried off by improper food, and irregularity in taking it; together with poisonous candies, and other unwholesome and indigestible trash, that no child or other person should eat. Many of these, it is true, do not die of diphtheria. But it should be remembered that all this goes to predispose those not actually killed by depraving the blood, and lessening the powers of vital resistance. And hence, when exposed to the contagion of diphtheria, or to putrid animal and vegetable exhalations, they are the first to take and most liable to die of it. Children on attaining the age of accountability, and all other persons, should take plain, nourishing and digestible food with strict regularity, and nothing between meals, or late at night. Trash, tobacco, intoxicating drinks, cosmetics, hair dyes, dime novels, etc., should be avoided by all. And while the amount of clothing should not be in excess, care should be taken to keep the arms, legs and feet well protected, and all dress should be adapted to the season.

Big Water on the Mississippi in 1844.

Life in the Mississippi swamp is unique, but, perhaps, never so much so as during that memorable summer. The shallowest water, for indefinite miles in any direction, was two feet deep, the nearest land the "Hills of Arkansaw," thirty miles away. The mules were quartered on the upper floor of the gin-house; the cattle had all been drowned long ago; planter, negroes and overseer were confined in their respective domiciles; the grist-mill was under water, and there was no means of preparing corn for culinary purposes except a wooden hominy-mortar. The hog-and-hominy diet (so highly extolled by some people who have never lived on it) was adopted of necessity, the former being represented by mess pork, salter than tongue can tell. There were no visitors, except now and then a sociable snake, which, no doubt bored by swimming around indefinitely in the overflow, and craving even human companionship, would glide up on the gallery of some of the houses. There was no means of locomotion except the skiff and the humble but ever-serviceable dug-out—nowhere to go and nobody within a day's journey otherwise or more comfortably situated. The only sense of sympathy from without was had from remote and infrequent glimpses of the gallant steamer J. M. White, which, leaping from point to point, made better time from New Orleans to St. Louis than was ever made, before or for many years after.

That year, nineteen plantations out of twenty failed to produce a single pound of cotton or a single bushel of corn, and when the flood was over and the swamp Noahs came out of their respective arks, they were, to say the least, malcontent. They were not ruined, of course, but they had lost a whole year's gross income. Moreover, the prestige of the swamp as a cotton country was wofully diminished. The planters in the "Hills," as the uplands are denominated, began to hold up their heads, no longer overcrowed by the extraordinary crops alleged to have been heretofore produced in the swamp.

The swamp-planters set to work to redeem the disaster, and to provide, as far as possible, against its recurrence. With the purpose of retrieving their financial fortunes they took some unique measures. There is a tradition that, at a public meeting held in Greenville, Miss., in October, 1844, among other more commonplace resolutions one was gravely and unanimously adopted to the effect that a demand for payment within twelve months from that date of any debt, great or small, upon any planter who had been overflowed that year, should be considered distinctly "personal"—a clear case for pistols and coffee. The code was certainly a curious institution, but probably this is the only instance in which it was expected to do duty as a stay-law.—"The Levees of the Mississippi," in Scribner.

Kissing Fair.

If any had supposed it would turn out the way it did, the scheme would not have been adopted, but the object was a charitable one, and the committee on invitation were very careful to avoid the presence of any disagreeable or unpopular person. The following price-list was finally adopted. For one go-as-you-please squeeze of one minute, and one kiss, terms cash, in advance:

Girls under 16	$ .25
Girls from 16 to 20	.50
Ladies from 20 to 25	.75
Married ladies under 30	1.00
Married ladies from 30 to 40	.50
Widows under 30	.75
Maiden ladies from 30 to 40	.50
Maiden ladies over 40	Two for a nickel

The gentlemen were all gathered in the dining-room and the ladies in the parlor. In the library was a committee of two—a lady and a gentleman (the latter being time-keeper)—and they called in the gentlemen one by one. Each was shown a schedule of prices and a list of the ladies present, and, when one selected the lady he wanted to kiss, she was called in and the transaction occurred in the presence of the committee. In cases where the squeeze was prolonged beyond the schedule time, or an additional smack taken, a fine of double price was charged for every minute in excess, and in several cases the fines were heavy, but were paid without a murmur. The whole affair was confidential, and none but the committee were to know who kissed who.—Rome (Ga.) Courier.

Is what a lady of Boston said to her husband when he brought home some medicine to cure her of sick headache and neuralgia which had made her miserable for fourteen years. At the first attack thereafter it was administered to her with such good results that she continued its use until cured, and was so enthusiastic in its praise that she induced twenty-two of the best families in her circle to adopt it as their regular family medicine. That "stuff" is Hop Bitters.—Standard.

Life.

The following stanza was written by Mrs. Barbauld in extreme old age. When it was repeated to Wordsworth, he said: "I am not in the habit of grudging people their things, but I wish I had written those lines."

Life! we've been so long together,
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather,
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear,
Perhaps 'twill cost a sigh, a tear;
Then steal away, give no warning,
Choose thine own time;
Say not good-night, but in some brighter clime
Bid me good-morning.

The Esthetic Art.

"Are your esthetic?" inquired a New Haven young lady of a Brooklyn girl, as the two sat down to a dish of fried clams in a Fulton street restaurant.

"I guess so," replied the Brooklyn girl, vaguely. "Why do you ask?"

"'Cause it's so terribly awfully the thing. We're all esthetic at home. Everybody is, and you don't know how we enjoy it."

"Is it—is it very expensive?" queried the Brooklyn girl, feeling her way.

"It comes rather high, but it is so essential. I haven't felt so well since I left school as I have since being esthetic. You don't know how much I have gained!"

"What's the nature of it? How do you take it?"

"Oh, you sit around and be excessive, and when any one speaks to you you glare at 'em and say, 'How quite!' Then you shut your eyes and breathe hard. I wouldn't be without it for anything. They say it's very healthy."

"Can you do it all alone?"

"Oh, gracious, no! It takes four or five to play. All you've got to do is to cut off your eyelashes, so as to look stony, and then practice with some chairs until you are ready to go into society. At home we commenced with clothespins to represent the gentlemen and bandoline bottles for the ladies. Then we joined the association and licked 'em all."

"I had an idea that esthetic meant the pleasurable sensations that arise from a gratification of artistic appreciation," explained the Brooklyn girl, timidly.

"Merciful goodness, no! On the contrary, it means the absence of taste. You mustn't have any taste. You must only be utter."

"How do you fetch that?"

"That's done by holding your breath until you are nearly ready to burst, and then let it out quick. You do that when somebody asks you if you are prepared to esthet. Then you go on estheting until the party breaks up. Myra Brown, of New Haven, is just lovely at it. We admire her so much."

"It must be fun," mused the Brooklyn girl, holding a clam on her fork and contemplating her companion.

"It just is. The gentlemen are ever so nice. They wear swallow-stomach coats and eye-glasses—"

"Eh?" ejaculated the Brooklyn girl, rather started at the uniform.

"Yes, and they are so extreme. Oh, you don't know. When we girls are estheting we wear a sort of shroud. Mine is a cashmere, and cost $2 a yard. Some of the societies wear lilies, but we use poppies. They are more languid. The last time we met somebody put red pepper on the stove, and I haven't fully recovered yet. Then some of the esthetes are gracile, but our society runs to flesh. We think it more soulful."

"I've got an idea that it's a sort of a fraud, from your description," observed the Brooklyn girl, gulping down the last clam.

"You nasty hussy!" shouted the esthete. "You've got no more intensity than a lobster! You're a coarse, vulgar animal! You are a sensile groveler! And, more than that, you pay for those clams or you stay in pawn for 'em!"

And the fragile follower of the prevailing fashion slammed out of the establishment, leaving her hard-headed friend to liquidate the account. It doesn't do to rouse up the unutterables. They are liable to forget the sufficient and become sibilant.—Brooklyn Eagle.

Laughing Away a Duel.

Laughter is an antidote to anger. Even a duel has been prevented by some amusing answer which turned wrath into mirth. A man holding both his sides can't hold a pistol.

A Georgia Judge named White, who wore a cork leg, once challenged a brother of the bench, Dooly by name, and a wag, to mortal combat. At the appointed hour both appeared on the field, but Dooly was alone. White sent his friend to ask where his antagonist's second was. "Gone into the woods," replied the humorous Dooly, "to get a bit of a hollow tree to put one of my legs in, that we may be even."

The answer was too much for Judge White; he laughed and so did his second, and the challenge was withdrawn.

An Irish lawyer, who had never fired a pistol, was challenged by a famous duelist whom he had offended by severe comments upon his testimony in court. The duelist, having been crippled in one of his duels, came limping upon the ground. He had one favor to ask, permission to lean against a mile-stone, as he was unable to stand without support.

The request was granted, and, just as the word "Fire!" was about to be given, the lawyer said he also had a request to make. He asked the privilege of leaning against the next mile-stone.

A hearty roar of laughter from seconds and challenger dissipated all thoughts of a duel.

The great orator of the Revolution, Patrick Henry, once received the following note, preliminary to a challenge from Gov. Giles, of Virginia:

"Sir: I understand you have called me a 'bob-tail' politician. I wish to know if it be true; and, if true, your meaning."

Mr. Henry replied in this style:

"Sir: I do not recollect having called you a 'bob-tail' politician at any time, but I think it probable I have. Not recollecting the time or occasion, I can't say what I did mean, but, if you will tell me what you think I meant, I will say whether you are correct or not."

Of course there was no duel.—Youth's Companion.

Old Story Retold.

"Long John" Wentworth, ex-Mayor of Chicago, is entirely b ld, except a little tuft of hair behind the ears, and on one occasion, when riding in the cars, he frequently took off his hat and scratched the back of his ears, when a waggish backwoodsman shouted: "Stranger, drive 'em up into the clearing and you can catch 'em all in five minutes."

Fencing.

Fencing is fallen very far from the high estate it held in the time of the great Italian and French masters, who brought it to a degree of perfection scarcely conceivable by those who have not read their elaborate treatises and studied the almost-endless variety of beautiful drawings by which their precepts are illustrated. Fencing is now recommended, not only because it is the best method of giving grace and agility to the body, but because it supplies a resource which at any moment may become of value, so that its claims are still strong to hold a place in the programme for the education of the finished gentleman. Beside these motives fencing possesses historic interest, and that eye must be unappreciative, indeed, which cannot see a high degree of beauty in an encounter between two accomplished fencers. France can to-day claim the best. There are many reasons for this fact. Some attribute it to the agility and acknowledged power of rapid physical action possessed by this nation; others to their natural vivacity and natural nimbleness; and still others to their almost romantic love for physical training. The French were made to be good swordsmen. The national standard (about five feet seven inches) is the height best calculated to contain all the elements of strength without superfluous weight. With them every regiment had its fencing-school, and of so much importance was the proper teaching of this art considered that Louis XIV. granted letters-patent to a number of eminent teachers who alone were permitted to teach in Paris. When a vacancy occurred neither influence nor favor could suffice to obtain this privilege. The applicant was obliged to fence in public with six chosen teachers, and if by any of them he was beaten by two more than a majority of hits he was rejected as unqualified to teach in the capital. The most eminent European physicians have earnestly recommended fencing to all men between the ages of 17 and 40 years. It is apparent that the attitudes and exertions of fencing are conducive to the most symmetrical physical development. Sir Everard Home says of this beautiful art: "Of all the different modes in which the body can be exercised, there is none in my judgment that is capable of giving strength and elasticity, as well as precision, to the action of all the voluntary muscles of the body in an equal degree as the practice of fencing, and none more conducive to bodily health."

Many similar extracts from letters of able physicians might be given, but it is sufficient to know that they all speak highly of it. Morning or evening is the best time for fencing for exercise. In England we may find in at least half of the houses of professional men foils and masks. Of late years fencing has begun to regain its old position. The man feels better, works better and has a clearer brain who takes this exercise. Broad shoulders, expanded chest and an erect carriage are certain results of it.

"Women Never Think."

If the crabbed old bachelor who uttered this sentiment could but witness the intense thought, deep study and thorough investigation of women in determining the best medicines to keep their families well, and would note their sagacity and wisdom in selecting Hop Bitters as the best, and demonstrating it by keeping their families in perpetual health, at a mere nominal expense, he would be forced to acknowledge that such sentiments are baseless and false.—Picayune.

RESCUED FROM DEATH.

William J. Coughlin, of Somerville, Mass., says: In the fall of 1876 I was taken with bleeding of the lungs, followed by a severe cough. I lost my appetite and flesh, and was confined to my bed. In 1877 I was admitted to the hospital. The doctors said I had a hole in my lung as big as a half dollar. At one time a report went around that I was dead. I gave up hope, but a friend told me of Dr. William Hall's Balsam for the Lungs. I got a bottle, when, to my surprise, I commenced to feel better, and to-day I feel better than for three years past. I write this hoping every one afflicted with diseased lungs will take Dr. William Hall's Balsam, and be convinced that consumption can be cured. I can positively say it has done more good than all the other medicines I have taken since my sickness.

THE president is still improving, according to latest news.

THE COURIER JOURNAL says that Platt posesses two virtues, resignation and imitation.

HON. GOV. SAULSBURY, ex-governor of Deleware, died last Monday at Dover, in that state.

SILVER and copper bearing ore has been discovered near Fort Laramie. Great excitement is the result.

COLONEL BURCH, secretary of the United States Senate, died last week in the city of Washington. His home is in Nashville, Tenn.

A STREET-CAR driver in Indianapolis, was assaulted by two roughs just in front of the exposition building, and in defending himself, he shot and killed both of them.

MUNCIE has been visited by a destructive fire, by which the large flax mills there and several manufacturing establishments were destroyed. Evansville has also had a big blaze, wiping out seventeen buildings.

THE NEW YORK TRIBUNE thinks the democrats in the legislature ought to have adjourned and put a stop to the republican quarrel and dead-lock. It don't seem to think that one or both wings of the republicans could also have adjourned.

WHILE a young lady was bathing at Chataqua lake, N. Y. recently a sand-turtle took advantage of the opportunity to "chaw" her ear. The beast held on, and in the struggle the lady came near drowning. Here in Indiana, the turtle don't act that way. We have heard of several boys near here—but why call up these harrowing scenes?

BOB INGERSOLL don't believe in praying for the recovery of the president. Now we don't believe in Bob's doctrine, either in politics or religion, both being unsound and unsafe, but we append a few of his remarks on the above named subject, for the especial benefit of those ministers of the gospel, who left their flocks to take care of themselves, and stumped the country in company with this same infidel, and in this way indirectly at least, assisted to make him and his pernicious doctrines popular, and to familiarize them in the minds of the people. In speaking of the meetings held for the purpose of praying for the stricken president, he says: "It strikes me that if God was going to play any part in this affair, He would have taken a hand earlier. God must have known all along, when He was allowing Guiteau to spend his time in beating hotel-keepers etc., that he was to shoot a president in 1881. If it meets God's approval, why pray to him? If it does not, why did he permit it? If God had interfered when Guiteau bought the pistol, and had allowed it to have shot himself as a victim, all would have been well. That would have been sensible. I have no objection to the whole nation praying for General Garfield, because I think it will do him no harm; but I would object very much if, instead of a staff of four good doctors, they should put a praying band about him. Then I would become alarmed. So long as the doctors and the patient do not rely on prayer, I have no fear. Prayer is a good thing for the one who prays, if he or she may like it; but it is of very little moment to the thing prayed for or the object being prayed to. I would believe there was some efficacy in prayer if a universal invocation should be sent up for the bullet to drop out, and it did so; and if God cannot put President Garfield on his feet at five minutes notice, He is no great shakes of a God after all—about as much good, I should say, as a last year's mullein-stalk. If I were sick I should much rather have a good doctor than any amount of prayer—not that I would want people to pray against me, for I would not want to have people's bad opinion."

Escape from Insane Asylum.

Henry Gunaka escaped from the State Insane Asylum on the 15th of May of this present year. He is thirty years of age, five feet five inches high, light complexion, light blue eyes, and light hair, weighs about 145 pounds, high cheek bones, stoops when he walks, and is round-shouldered. We understand that the members of his family, who reside in Clay county, are in very great suspense and severe anguish regarding him. As they are in straitened circumstances, it is in their behalf that the Sentinel requests the State Press to make note of Gunaka's escape and a description of his person. If any one knows of his whereabouts, a brief line to C. M. Thompson, of Bowling Green, Clay county, will reach the unfortunate man's family.

WE publish below two articles headed "Exit Conkling," or some thing to that effect. The first appeared in the Indinapolis Times of July 23, and the second was in the Auburn Republican of July 28. We presume our friends, the editors of the two papers, will not deny the above statement. So the only question now before us is: Which of the numerous editors employed on both papers, took the original article, turned the words around a little, omitted a sentence or two, and then palmed off the mutilated mosaic upon its readers as an original article? It looks as if some one's ideas had been "expedited" by getting hold of some one else's ideas.

EXIT CONKLING.

[From the Indianapolis Times.]

The Hon. E. G. Lepham was yesterday elected United States Senator from New York, to succeed Roscoe Conkling. Thus the dead-lock at Albany is ended in a manner that will carry joy to the great republican heart of the nation. Mr. Conkling has been defeated in his selfish schemes, and President Garfield's administration is vindicated. He drew the sword and has perished by the sword. He has made his bed and the Legislature has said he may lie in it. For more than two months past the contest has been going on at Albany, to which city Messrs. Conkling and Platt took a change of venue from Washington. That Conkling expected to be "vindicated" and triumphantly returned to the Senate no person doubts. That was the motive of his resignation and desertion of his post of duty. He has failed to and failed ignominiously. He reckoned without his host. With the misleading judgment of a constitutional egotist he overestimated his own strength as much as he underestimated the popularity of President Garfield. It is humiliating to contemplate that at the very moment when the president was stricken down by the bullet of an assassin, Conkling was at Albany organizing war on the administration.

His tactics at Albany have led him through every phase of opposition to the party organization. Beginning with the assumption that nobody but himself had a right to be a candidate for Senator, he ended by opposing the caucus nominee, and denouncing the regular republican candidate as "a traitor to me." When he found that he could not be elected himself, he bent his whole energies to defeating the regular republican candidate. How nearly he succeeded the protracted struggle shows. Happily, he was not able to accomplish his object, and Mr. Lapham was yesterday elected by a decided majority, receiving 24 votes more than enough to elect. The vote shows that the Conkling men became convinced of the hopelessness of their fight against the party organization, and finally concluded to submit. In this they did well, but it would have been far better for him and for them if they had never entered upon the fight. What will Conkling do? Will he quit politics and return to the practice of law? Will he retire temporarily from public life and abide his time for an auspicious return? Will he appeal to the people and attempt to regain his lost ground in a popular election? Will he form a secret alliance with the democracy and attempt in this way to get revenge on the republican party? These are questions which everybody will be asking, but which time alone can answer. The only thing certain is that he will pursue whatever course he thinks best calculated to restore his personal power and prestige. As this has been his sole motive in the past, so, doubtless, it will be in the future.

LORD ROSCOE'S EXIT.

[From the Auburn Republican.]

The Hon. E. G. Lapham was elected United States Senator from New York, to succeed Roscoe Conkling last Friday, and the deadlock at Albany was broken in a manner that carried joy to the great republican heart of the nation. The selfish schemes of Conkling have been defeated, and the administration of President Garfield is vindicated. No person doubts that Conkling expected to have his course "vindicated" and himself triumphantly returned to the United States Senate by the New York Legislature, and this was, doubtless, the reason why he deserted his post of duty, but he has met with ignominious failure. He overestimated his own strength with the misleading judgment of a constitutional egotist, even as he underestimated the popularity of President Garfield, and at the very moment when Garfield was stricken down by the assassin's bullet, he was at Albany, organizing the war against the administration. When he found he could not be elected himself, he concentrated his whole energies toward accomplishing the defeat of the regular republican candidate, and the protracted struggle shows how nearly he succeeded. Happily, he was not able to accomplish his object, and Elbridge G. Lapham was elected by a very decided majority, receiving 24 votes more than enough to elect. The Conkling men, becoming convinced that their fight against the party organization was useless, finally concluded to submit. They did well in making this decision, but it would have been much better for them if they had never entered upon the fight.

Some of the questions which are now asked are: What will Conkling do? Will he quit poitics and return to the practice of law? Will he retire to private life and abide his time for an auspicious return? Will he appeal to the people and attempt to regain his lost ground in a popular election? The only thing certain is that he will pursue the course he thinks best calculated to restore his personal power and prestige.

Death of Gen. James R. Slack.

Chicago, Ill., July 28.—General James R. Slack, of Huntington, Ind., fell in an apoplectic fit at the corner of Fifth avenue and Madison street about ten o'clock this morning. He was carried into Arend's drugstore, where he lay unconscious, and where no effort seems to have been made to find what was the matter or to establish his identity. In a few minutes a policeman's patrol-wagon was telephoned for, and in this vehicle the inanimate form was jolted to the "Alexian Brothers' Hospital," on the north-side, and over three miles away. He died there at 11:30 p. m.

General Slack was well known as a democratic politician and a prominent leader of that party. He settled in Huntington in 1846 or '47, and that continued to be his home until his death. He was of Pennsylvania extraction. From 1848 to 1860 John R. Coffroth, now of Lafayette, and a brother-in-law, was his law partner. General Slack rapidly took high rank at the bar, accumulated a large practice, and was regarded as one of the best lawyers in this part of the state. Although an ardent partisan and a democrat of life-long conviction, at the breaking out of the war Slack sided with the Union cause, and he organized and was commissioned colonel of the old forty-seventh Indiana, which rendezvoused at Anderson. His gallantry and efficiency made him conspicuous in the field and in the camp, and shortly after the fall of Memphis he was promoted brigadier-general, and for a long time was in command of the Second brigade, Twelfth division, Thirteen corps. During the Mississippi campaign he participated in the battles of Grand Gulf, Port Gibson, Champion Hills, Jackson and all the other engagements incident to the fall of Vicksburg. After the war he became one of the conspicuous political leaders in his county. During the last campaign he was the democratic candidate for congress in his district, and was defeated by Major Steele. At the time of his death he was judge of the Circuit court district composed of Huntington, Grant and Blackford counties, serving his third term. He was also largely identified with the First National Bank at Huntington. He leaves a wife, but no children.—[Wabash Plaindealer.

Freaks of the Lightning.

During the terrible storms of one week ago last Wednesday night, the wind-mill that runs the pump of John Boots' well, west of Spencerville, was struck by lightning. The freaks of the fluid were most remarkable. Mr. Boots saw most of the occurrence, and can testify to so much of it as could be seen. The charge seemed at first to come from above, and strike the derrick going down to the ground and then returning with redoubled violence. In its ascent, it gave off balls of fire that were thrown to some distance, especially in the direction of the barn, which he feared to see burst into flame at any minute. These fire balls were terrible in their dazzling, bluish brilliancy; so bright were they that the eyes were pained to look at them. But the display was soon over, greatly to the relief of himself and family. On examining the wind-mill in the morning, he was surprised to see how little damage had been done, but still more astonished to see the nature of what it had accomplished. The rod used for throwing the machine into and out of gear was partly melted away; the bolts on the gearing had many of the nuts loosened, and one entirely off and lying on a part of the timber near where it belonged. The paint on this was entirely cleaned off, and the fluid had eaten into the substance of the iron like an acid. A remarkable feature, was that all the cast iron about the machine was unharmed, the wrought iron only being touched. Boots says he cannot account for the nuts on the bolts being turned off instead of on, unless it was left-hand lightning. But whether it was or not, he don't care to have it come fooling around him any more.

Obituary.

Mrs. Geo. W. Koons died last Thursday morning at the home of her son, John Koons, in Waterloo.

Charlotte Sinclair was born in Bedford county, Virginia, September 16, 1801. With her parents she moved to the state of Ohio, in the year 1803, where she grew to womanhood. March 28, 1821 she was united in marriage to George W. Koons, with whom she lived over 60 years. They moved to the state of Michigan in 1855, and lived in that state 26 years. She professed conversion, and united with the Methodist Episcopal church in the year 1824. In this church she lived an earnest, devoted christian, until her death which occured in Waterloo, Indiana, July 28, 1881, at the advanced age 79 years 10 months and 12 days. For seven years she had been deprived of her sight, was blind. This was a great affliction, yet by faith she still looked to God, trusted in the Lord Jesus, and in hope anticipated a brighter day in Heaven. She was the mother of five sons and three daughters. Her husband four sons and three daughters survive her.

—The selection of what hotel to stop at, is often a perplexing conundrum to the visitors in a large city. To any visiting Chicago, this difficulty is easily avoided, as there is now visiting us B. L. Newman, esq., of that city, junior member of the firm of Newman Bros., proprietors of those two well-known hotels, Burdick House and Barnes House. These houses are centrally located in the heart of the city, adjacent to railroad depots and wholesale houses and are in every way suited to the traveling public. The hosts are young in years, but old in experience, and we are sure no effort on their part will be wanting to make their guests comfortable. There is a large restaurant in connection. Prices moderate. 30 2t.

Serious Accident.

Last Thursday Andrew Baxter, of Franklin township, father of J. W. Baxter, county clerk, met with a serious accident in Hamilton. A colt he was driving shied in starting over a bridge, and Mr. Baxter, to urge it to go over, struck it with the whip, when the team started to run. The pole of the buggy broke, and, striking the ground, threw Mr. Baxter out. His leg was broken at the thigh, and he was somewhat hurt otherwise. Dr. Chamberlain was called and set the broken limb, and at last accounts, the injured man was doing well.

The boys take advantage of the shades of evening to do a little "surf bathing" in Cedar creek.

Herman Hursh and his brother, from Angola, expect to locate in Hicksville, Ohio, shortly, and go into business there. We wish them abundant success.

The game of base ball at Butler last Friday, resulted in a score of 42 to 28 in favor of Waterloo, and some say it was not a very good day for making runs, either.

F. P. Day has both his brothers here now, assisting him in his business. Dealers in agricultural implements seem to have enjoyed the season very well after all.

Mrs. O. T. Clark was able to walk out a short distance last Friday, and made a call or two, to the great surprise and delight of her neighbors. She has had a long and serious illness, and it must be pleasant to move about once more.

A. B. Walsworth and Carrie Bassett, of this place, were married Tuesday evening at the residence of the bride's parents. Rev. H. J. Norris, of the M. E. church in Auburn, officiated. The young couple have our best wishes.

The old soldiers' lawn social at F. Willis' last Saturday evening, was well attended. Over one hundred fifty guests were present. The lawn was brilliantly lighted up with lanterns, and the hours passed away pleasantly.

Right jolly are those boys over the joke on the two boys from Auburn, who stole their banjo and pair of bones. While waiting for the Auburn boys to bring their instruments back, they industriously circulated the report that officers would be sent to get them. This brought the music to the limits of town, from which point a substitute could deliver them to the owners in safety. Hence these smiles.

Waterloo now has a poet as well as a base ball club. The following is among the various out-growths of a recent game.

Nine brave boys from Pleasant Lake
Came down to play base ball,
Some looked chirp and some looked sad,
But Ed. looked worst of all,
For a hundred dollars was the stake,
And Ed. had fifteen there,
"And that will break me up," he said,
And he sighed and tore his hair.
But they puffed their cheeks,
And their muscles blew,
And said "what shall we do?
For the first we know,
Our money's gone,
And our reputation too."
So they walked the streets,
And talked of snide,
Till the people went away,
Though our boys offered all they asked,
If they would only play,
But their money was safe in their pockets,
And there they were bound it should stay.

Ed Blattner's night blooming cereus was on exhibition Monday evening. The flower began to open during the day by unfolding its numerous long, green sepals or leafy envelops. Then as night approached, and the sun went down, the creamy white petals of the flower proper began to loosen their pearly edges, and gradually to reveal the hidden beauties of the interior. And it was indeed a rare and beautiful vision, the whole interior was so delicately constructed, and so symmetrically arranged. The stamens, delicate in themselves, were supported by their slender thread-like filaments, and so arranged as almost to resemble a minute forest, the stems of which were reclining on the ground with their tiny tops pointing upward. Even the pistil with its many curious points was a thing of beauty. No one could see this beautiful and rare flower without admiring it. Throngs of curious visitors filled the yard where it was standing, and when it was taken into the house for the benfit of the light, they followed it there. Mr. and Mrs. B. played the host to their continually coming guests till a late hour. Then the flower closed never to open again, for it is one of the strange whims of nature, that this flower opens but once, and that is in the night. Each year it puts forth one, or perhaps two buds, and no more. Mr. Blattner's plant is about seven years old, and may be expected to bloom each year after this.

Sparks from a locomotive set fire to a field of wheat near Fostoria recently. As it was dry, the flames spread so rapidly that over sixty shocks were destroyed before the fire was got under control.

Work was begun on the foundation of the Straw board mill Monday morning, and if the weather is favorable, and nothing else interferes, they expect to have the brick work all done in a couple of weeks.—[Elkhart Democrat.

If any of our readers were once admirers of the "Bill Poster," a scurrilous sheet published at South Bend a few years ago, it may interest them to learn that the editor of that sheet, Harry Hans, now has the contract for carrying the mails from the trains to the postoffice in that city.

A woman at South bend got the better of her quarreling husband, by taking a lump of dough, in which she was working, and pasting it over the good man's head and face. He succumbed. South Bend is noted for original ideas. With this lesson before us, we shall continue to buy our bread at the baker's.—[Goshen Times.

CRAWFISH.—The Ionia National has the following in reference to a new potato fiend: "A potato destroyer, one and one-half inches long and shaped like a crawfish, has appeared in Waterloo, Jackson county. It eats out the inside of potatoes, and then runs into the ground as easily as if sharpened for that purpose. As a potato destroyer, it discounts the Colorado pest."

The Kelley House, of Syracuse, is fast becoming one of the attractive features to those who seek Turkey Lake and its surroundings for rusticating purposes. The Dr., with his jolly face, in connection with the social and mental qualifications of Mrs. K., makes it one of the green spots that is impressed on the memory as we travel down life's rugged path.—[Warsaw Union.

The adopted daughter of Mr. Frank Kines, living south of the railroad, met with rather a peculiar, and what might have been a serious accident. Friday night, after dark, she stepped out doors, passing near the cistern, when it caved in, carrying her into the cistern, together with an iron kettle. She was gotten out without being injured, farther than receiving a good soaking.—[Elkhart Democrat.

Elkhart Review: A curious freak of lightning was noticed at the house of John Minon early last evening. Mrs. Minon was sitting on one side of an open window, and two children were sitting on the opposite side, when a flash seemed to pass between them, and it was noticed that a lamp, sitting on the table six feet from the window, had been lighted. Neither Mrs. M. nor the children were injured.

Monday of last week as Mr. Henry Hanna, of Fort Wayne, was crossing the bridge over the St. Mary, near the Jackson depot, the north end of the bridge began to give way. Mr. Hanna tried to back his horse to save himself, but failed to do so. The sinking bridge took both he and his horse into the river. The horse and buggy were held under water by the timbers and the horse was drowned. Mr. Hanna was rescued after clinging to the timbers of the bridge for awhile, and at first it was supposed he was not much hurt. But the shock had evidently been too great for him, for he died that evening.

The Goshen Times has the following: "Yesterday a stranger jumped from one of the afternoon trains at the Main street crossing, while the train was moving at a rapid speed, and, without stopping, ran through town, turning west at the public square, and went to the house of John Stouder, about a mile west of town, where he took possession of an upper room. He soon became very boisterous and noisy, praying and screaming, and breaking things generally. All efforts to dislodge him have so far proved vain, as he defends himself with crocks of apple butter, broken pieces of furniture, etc. The man is of course a maniac."

A skeleton has been dug up in Wayne township, Noble county, while excavating for a cellar. The head was found to be crushed; the body was evidently thrown into a hole head downwards, and there are other indications of a dark and bloody crime. No one can remember that any one was ever buried there. The only probable solution is, that it is the body of a man who came to Noble county over thirty years ago, looking for a location, and who suddenly disappeared in the neighborhood where these remains were found. Letters were received from his friends in Ohio, asking for information, but none could be given. All traces of him were lost, and it is now believed that he fell into the hands of the blacklegs who then infested the county, and was murdered.

The South Bend Register in speaking of gun-shot wounds similar to Garfield's, says: "The opening of the pus sack in the president's case makes it similar to that of County Clerk Howard. He was shot during the war in the throat, the ball taking a long range and passing out through his left shoulder blade. Three operations for pus sacks were necessary in his case, the previous symptoms and the subsequent relief closely resembling the president's. Prof. Howard came near dying through loss of strength, the writing of an unusually long letter exhausting him so that he sank back and thinks he would have died but for the encouraging words of his nurse, which acted as a strong stimulant."

CHARLES EDWARD and Albert Talbot were hanged at Maryville, Mo., July 22, for having, on the night of Sept. 18, 1880, shot and mortally wounded their father, Dr. Perry H. Talbot, of Nodaway county, Mo. Albert protested that he was entirely innocent of the crime for which he was hanged, and charged that one Wyatt, a hired man employed by Dr. Talbot, and who was the approver in the case, was the murderer. The boys' mother, and a Miss Lewis, the fiancee of Albert, accompanied the doomed men to the scaffold, and there was quite an exciting scene.... THE Southwestern railroad managers and the Governor of Missouri met in conference at St. Louis for the purpose of deliberating upon means to bring the Rock Island train-robbers to justice. In stating the object of the meeting, Gov. Crittenden referred to the disgrace brought on the State by the escape of the outlaws, and the fact that they were still at large. He also, it is said, called for the co-operation of the railroads in the efforts of the State to effect their capture, giving it as his idea that nothing would go so far toward bringing about this end as the offering of a large reward. The Missouri Pacific offered to contribute $5,000, the Iron Mountain $5,000, and five other roads coming forward immediately with $5,000 apiece. The lowest amount given was $2,500. The contract was drawn and signed, the subscription amounting to $50,000, $20,000 of which is for the apprehension of the James boys, the remainder in equal portions for the rest of the gang.... A ten-mile horse race between Miss M. Pinneo, of Greeley, Col., and Miss Curtis, of Topeka, Kan., came off at Leadville. Miss Pinneo won the race in twenty-six minutes. Her competitor dismounted and fainted on the eighth mile.

THE summer dramatic season at McVicker's Theater, Chicago, opens this week, with the grand spectacular drama which has created such a sensation in London and New York, "The World." It is the first scientific attempt at literally molding together romance and mechanism. The drama is not subordinated to the spectacle, nor the spectacle to the drama. Each is consistently maintained; but the surprises are most frequent and most lasting in the spectacle. The mechanical devices employed are, many of them, novel, and the realism of the spectacle is astounding in several of the episodes. It is quite needless to add that "The World" will be presented at McVicker's with absolute fidelity to the original designs; the mounting has involved weeks of labor, and exhausted the craft of the scene painters and mechanics.

POLITICAL.

The deadlock at Albany was broken July 22, and the Legislature adjourned the following day. The administration men made some concessions by entering into a conference or caucus in which Lapham was nominated by a unanimous vote. He was afterward elected to succeed Roscoe Conkling in the United States Senate by the full Republican vote, the Democrats voting for ex-Congressman Potter. When Mr. Conkling received the dispatch advising him of the election of Lapham, he immediately sent the following telegram:

> NEW YORK, July 22.
>
> To the Hon. James Armstrong, Member of the Assembly, Albany:
>
> The heroic constancy of the Spartan band which so long has stood for principle and truth has my deepest gratitude and admiration. Borne down by forbidden and abhorrent forces, and agencies which never before had sway in the Republican party, the memory of their courage and manhood will long live in the brightest honor. The near future will vindicate their wisdom, and crown them with approval. Please ask them all for me to receive my grateful acknowledgments.

The cost of railroad and equipment aggregated $4,653,609,297. Upon bonds $107,866,328 interest was paid, and on stock $77,115,411. The gross earnings reported for the year aggregated $615,401,931, against $529,012,999 in 1879. The net earnings were $255,193,436, against $219,916,724 in 1879. Earnings were divided between freight and passenger in the following proportions—viz.: Freight, $467,748,928; passenger, $147,-653,003. For the previous year they were divided as follows: Freight, $386,676,108; passenger, $142,336,191. Of the total mileage 33,499 miles were laid with steel rails. Statistics of equipment show that 7,949 locomotives, 12,789 passenger cars, 539,355 freight cars and 4,786 miscellaneous cars were employed.

THE American Papermakers' Association held its annual convention at Saratoga, N. Y. The President's and the Secretary's reports showed that the trade has made great progress during the year, that there had been an increase in the production of book and newspaper paper of 25 per cent., and 33 per cent. increase in writing-paper. The Judge said its publication would create a sensation throughout the country.

France promises to pay the relatives of those Spaniards that were killed a certain sum of "blood-money," but proposes that compensation for damages to property be determined by an international arbitration committee, which shall also determine the amount of compensation due to French subjects whose harvests have suffered during the "risings" in Spain. The Spanish press scout the idea of entertaining the proposals of France, and there exists among the Spaniards very bitter feelings against their Gallic neighbors.

ADDITIONAL NEWS.

NEWS comes from India to the effect that Ayoob Khan has defeated the Ameer Abdurrahman Khan. During the engagement between the two armies a regiment of the Ameer's deserted, and thereupon the balance of his army ignominiously fled, leaving their guns and baggage behind. England must either reinstate the Ameer, or, by leaving him to his fate, lose the prestige she gained in that country recently at an enormous cost of lives and treasure. The Indian Government are greatly concerned at the gravity of the situation.

TEN THOUSAND persons, including William H. Vanderbilt, assembled at Philadelphia to see Maud S. go against her Pittsburgh record. EACH day brings forth fresh particulars tending to prove Guiteau one of the meanest ruffians of this or any other country. His wife procured a divorce from him in the fall of 1873, and the base ruffian was one of the witnesses against himself, and induced the woman with whom he was guilty to take the stand also to testify that the charges of infidelity against him were true. At the time of the divorce Guiteau frequented the rooms of the New York Young Men's Christian Association, and was a member of Calvary Baptist Church and attended religious services there. It is due to the church, however, to say that Guiteau was expelled by them, notwithstanding the fact that he whined and pretended penitence for his immoralities.... Mr. Van Marter, city editor of the National Democrat, of Peoria, Ill., states that the infernal machines recently seized at Liverpool were manufactured in Peoria. The machines, he said, were shipped to New York, where they were loaded with dynamite, after which they were shipped to Liverpool.

THE home and birthplace of President Madison at Montpelier, Va., was sold last week at public auction to James L. Carrington, of the Exchange Hotel, Richmond, Va. The price paid was $20,000.

THE PRESIDENT.

WASHINGTON, July 23.

The President continues to progress favorably. He is gradually gaining strength, and the physicians are now all but confident of his recovery. The wound continues to discharge healthy pus. Yesterday a fragment of bone came with the pus, which indicates that the depths of the wound are being drained. Still the President is very weak. The physicians say that the food which he receives is now sufficient to add a little to his strength, and to supply the waste which is constantly going on through the wound, but it is found that he is not yet capable of resisting any unusual excitement, and, for this reason, the surgeons in charge insist upon as perfect quiet as can be secured. Hon. George B. Loring, Commissioner of Agriculture, had an interview with the President, in which the latter recalled his promise to visit the Wisconsin State Fair, and declared that he had not yet given up the trip.

WASHINGTON, July 25.

President Garfield had an alarming relapse on Saturday. The wound, which had for several days discharged a considerable quantity of healthy pus, became obstructed near the inner end of the drainage tube, while the process of suppuration in the deeper parts of the wound continued. A "pus cavity," partial or complete, was thus formed, and the discharge from the mouth of the wound ceased. The patient was then taken with a chill, which was followed by a high fever, the pulse rising to 130 and the temperature to 104. His condition caused great alarm, as it was feared that blood-poisoning had set in, or that an abscess had begun to form. An examination of the pus discharged, however, showed that all the indications of blood-poisoning were absent. Further examination showed that there was little to fear from the formation of an abscess, and that the chill and subsequent fever were caused by the "pus cavity" alone. Drs. Agnew and Hamilton were hastily summoned to Washington. An examination of the wound by these eminent masters of surgery showed beyond doubt that a "pus cavity" had formed in the track of the ball and beyond the point where it glanced from the rib, and that the cavity could only be reached by an incision three inches below the mouth of the wound. The incision was made by Dr. Agnew, and the cavity was reached at a little more than an inch below the surface. A tube was inserted into this incision, and the pus commenced to flow freely, and the discharge was entirely satisfactory to the physicians. Since the operation the President's condition has continued to improve. This morning he is resting easily, and the physicians say that, notwithstanding the complications, the chances are in favor of his recovery.

Dr. Agnew had the cooling apparatus taken out of the President's room. He said it kept the President's temperature uneven.

Prof. Bell's electrical indicator for locating a bullet in the human body was experimented with before Dr. Agnew. The result showed that the invention could be relied on when the ball was only two inches below the surface.

WASHINGTON, July 26.

The President has passed a quiet and comfortable day and night, and the surgeons take a very hopeful view of the situation. The President partook of milk, beef juice, and a little toast in sufficient quantities to maintain his strength. There was a fairly copious discharge of healthy pus during the day. A slight pressure on the front wall of the abdomen increases the discharge. Dr. Bliss says there is little reason to fear the formation of a new pus cavity, because the discharge is free and uninterrupted. There has not been at any time any symptom of blood-poisoning in the President's case, and there is no reason to apprehend it now. The doctor concluded by saying that the President was three days better than he was last Friday. Dr. Agnew said that the President's chances of recovery are good, but he is not out of danger. He thought that he may yet be able to locate the bullet, which he wishes removed. He said there may be another chill resulting from the condition the President has passed through, but no more serious complications are looked for in the case. There are evidences of the old wound's healing.

Ex-Senator Conkling, in company with Senator Jones, of Nevada, called at the White House yesterday, and had an interview with Dr. Bliss. Mr. Conkling said that the unfavorable turn in the President's case was a source of anxiety to him; and, on being informed by Dr. Bliss that the symptoms were of an encouraging character, he expressed himself as greatly pleased. He requested Dr. Bliss to convey to Mrs. Garfield his expression of his sincere sympathy.

Guiteau seems to be rather pleased than otherwise at his present quarters. He is afraid that if he should get outside the prison walls he would be meted out speedy justice. The other day when asked to go down into the Warden's office he very reluctantly consented, fearing that it was a ruse to get him into the people's hands. The cowardly scoundrel yet expresses a wish that the President may die.

WASHINGTON, July 27.

Some splinters of the bone were removed from the President's wound yesterday by Dr. Agnew, and after the operation the patient felt much better and the pus began to flow more freely. The temperature and respiration fell to their normal condition and the pulse fell to 98. Surgeons say there is nothing critical or dangerous in the President's condition. He was, they said, better last night than he has been for five days, and everything looks favorable. He took nourishment, consisting of beef extract, milk and lime water and toast at various intervals yesterday. There were only slight febrile symptoms last evening, and the temperature rose to only 100.7, as compared with 100.8 the previous day, and almost immediately receded to a more satisfactory figure. This morning the patient is resting comfortably.

The surgeons took out the semi-circular drainage-tube yesterday and inserted a straight one into the new incision. They intend to allow the mouth of the wound to heal up and to drain the wound through the incision made Sunday.

The President's medical attendants have decided not to be interviewed any more about the phases of his case, as they claim they have been misconstrued by reporters. Hereafter the official bulletins will be the only source of information touching the patient's condition.

Mrs. Garfield's weakened condition and nervousness causes considerable uneasiness. Dr. Boynton and Mrs. Edson are looking after the good lady's welfare, but are convinced that her husband's recovery and a change of air and scene must precede any great improvement in her condition.

WASHINGTON, July 28.

There was a very decided improvement in the President's condition yesterday, and he seems to have already recovered the ground lost by the relapse which set in Saturday. He took an increased quantity of nourishment and relished it. He expressed himself repeatedly during the day as feeling much better. There was an entire absence of febrile feeling yesterday afternoon, which the physicians regard as a most-hopeful sign. For the first time in three weeks the patient's temperature at the evening examination was normal. There was a full, free discharge of healthy pus during the day. The patient has obtained more sleep than usual, and has been greatly refreshed thereby. The physicians express the belief that the improvement of yesterday was a permanent gain, and that the patient is on the way to complete recovery.

The examinations of the President's wound which have been made within the last four days have led to a different conclusion as to the course and location of the ball from that which was at first entertained. It is now pretty certain that it did not penetrate the liver, and that, if it touched it, it grazed it in its downward course; that it is not located in the anterior wall of the abdomen, and did not traverse the abdominal cavity, but went downward after being interrupted by the rib, and is now located in what the doctors describe as the right iliac fossa. This is the cavity between the front of the hip-bone and the ribs which contains the small intestines. No effort will be made to extract the ball at present unless it is found to be troublesome.

A morning newspaper publishes an interview with Gen. Crocker, Warden of the jail, about Guiteau. Crocker said, speaking of Guiteau: "There has been no event in his life during the past week that has been worthy of mention. He eats, sleeps and wakes up like any other prisoner. No one has come to see him from the day he was brought here. No one has manifested any friendly interest in him. He does not seem to have any friends. Guiteau is as quiet as any other prisoner. He seems to have made up his mind to patiently await the result. He has not asked for a lawyer. He has not asked to see any one. I asked him if he wanted a lawyer. He said no, not at present. He claims to be a lawyer himself. He knows enough not to talk. He is sane enough not to talk. He reads mostly the Bible and serious works. There is nothing peculiar about him. I take no stock in his insanity. There has been nothing in his actions here to indicate it any more than in the condition of other criminals. I don't think he is a man of strong moral convictions."

WASHINGTON, July 29.

The condition of the President continues favorable and encouraging. It is believed by one of the physicians that the patient will be able to leave his bed in ten days. While this appears a rather too sanguine statement, the medical staff believe that the wound is healing, and that, unless some unforeseen change should occur, his recovery now is merely a matter of time. Last evening there was a slight rise in the pulse and in the temperature, caused by a stoppage of the drainage-tubes, which prevented the regular flow of the pus. When the tubes were cleaned the flow resumed and the fever subsided. The patient rested quietly during the night, and this morning is doing nicely. In the belief that the carpets in the sick-room secreted too much dust and absorbed impurities from the atmosphere, they were yesterday taken from the floor, after the President had been removed to another chamber, overlooking Lafayette Park.

A TOUCHING LETTER.

Mr. Gladstone to Mrs. Garfield.

LONDON, July 22, 1881.

Blaine, Secretary, Washington:

I cable text of note, date 21st, from Mr. Gladstone to Mrs. Garfield. Original by dispatch to-morrow:

LONDON, July 21, 1881.

Dear Madam:

You will, I am sure, excuse me, though a personal stranger, for addressing you by letter to convey to you the assurances of my own feelings and those of my countrymen on the occasion of the terrible attempt to murder the President of the United States, in a form more palpable at least than that of messages conveyed by telegraph. Those feelings have been feelings, in the first instance, of sympathy, and afterward of joy and thankfulness almost comparable, and, I venture to say, only second to the strong emotions of the great nation of which he is the appointed head. Individually I have, let me beg you to believe, had my full share in the sentiments which have possessed the British nation. They have been prompted and quickened by what I venture to think is an ever-growing sense of harmony and mutual respect and affection between the two countries, and of the relationship which from year to year becomes a more and more practical bond of union between us. But they have also drawn much of their strength from the cordial admiration of the simple heroism which has marked the personal conduct of the President; for we have not yet wholly lost the capacity of appreciating such an example of Christian faith and manly fortitude. This exemplary picture has been made complete by your own contribution to its noble and touching features, on which I only forbear to dwell because I am directly addressing you. I beg to have my respectful compliments and congratulations conveyed to the President, and to remain, dear madam, with great esteem, your most faithful servant,

W. E. GLADSTONE.

SECRETARY BLAINE'S REPLY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 23.

Lowell, Minister, London:

I have laid before Mrs. Garfield the note of Mr. Gladstone, just received by cable. I am requested by her to say that, among the many thousand manifestations of interest and expressions of sympathy which have reached her, none has more deeply touched her heart than the kind words of Mr. Gladstone. His own solicitude and condolence are received with gratitude; but, far beyond this, she recognizes that Mr. Gladstone rightfully speaks for the people of the British isles, whose sympathy in this national and personal affliction has been as quick and sincere as that of her own countrymen. Her chief pleasure in Mr. Gladstone's cordial letter is found in the comfort which it brings to her husband. The President is cheered and solaced on his painful and weary way to health by many messages of sympathy, which, in his returning strength, he safely receives and most gratefully appreciates.

BLAINE, Secretary.

THE NATIONAL DEBT.

Various Issues of Bonds, and Their Distribution by States.

Of the total national debt at the dates nearest the close of the census year, June 30, 1880, $1,173,749,250 were registered. To make this total the various issues of the bonds are taken at the following dates:

Registered 4 per cent. consols of 1907, on which the quarterly dividend of interest was paid July 1, 1880	$698,100,500
Registered 4½-per-cent. funded loan of 1891, on which the quarterly dividend was paid June 1, 1880	179,280,800
Registered 5-per-cent. loan of '81, on which the quarterly dividend of interest was paid Aug. 1, 1880	194,440,800
Registered 6-per-cent. loans of '80 and '81, on which the semi-annual dividend of interest was paid July 1, 1880	180,926,700
Total	$1,173,749,250

Mr. Robert P. Porter, who has had charge of this branch of the census work, found that the registered bonds were distributed through the country as follows:

Private individuals and corporations	$644,990,400
Foreign holders	27,894,350
National banks (to secure circulation)	319,937,800
Total	$992,822,550

The 6-per-cent. bonds were only payable in ten cities of the country, and, in consequence, it was impossible to distribute them in States and large cities, as was done in the case of 4, 4½ and 5-per-cent. bonds. From this total of $1,173,749,250, there must be deducted the aggregate of the 6-per-cent. registered bonds at that time, which was $180,926,700. After deducting this amount there remained of the other three species of registered bonds $992,-822,550.

It will be extremely interesting to note the distribution of the $644,990,400 of bonds which were owned by private individuals and corporations. These owners number 73,114, and are distributed in the various States as follows:

State.	Number.	Percentage of Bond-holders.	Percentage of Population.
Massachusetts	16,855	23.04	3.56
New York	14,808	20.24	10.14
Pennsylvania	10,408	14.23	8.54
Ohio	4,130	5.64	6.37
Illinois	3,101	4.23	6.14
New Hampshire	3,339	4.52	0.69
New Jersey	2,715	3.70	2.26
Connecticut	2,367	3.23	1.24
District of Columbia	2,357	3.21	0.36
Vermont	1,909	2.61	0.67
Maine	1,711	2.34	1.29
Missouri	963	1.27	4.32
Maryland	920	1.26	1.86
Banks	906	1.25	None
Rhode Island	838	1.24	0.55

Michigan	459	0.62	3.26
Kentucky	451	0.61	3.29
California	412	0.56	1.72
Tennessee	399	0.51	3.07
Wisconsin	342	0.47	2.63
Kansas	325	0.44	1.99
Iowa	269	0.39	3.23
Louisiana	262	0.35	1.87
West Virginia	194	0.26	1.26
Mississippi	157	0.20	2.25
North Carolina	143	0.19	2.79
Texas	139	0.19	3.17
South Carolina	137	0.19	1.98
Alabama	126	0.16	2.52
Territories	111	0.14	1.27
Delaware	100	0.13	0.29
Minnesota	94	0.12	1.55
Arkansas	78	0.09	1.60
Florida	66	0.09	0.53
Colorado	61	0.09	0.39
Georgia	59	0.08	3.06
Nebraska	55	0.07	0.90
Nevada	18	0.03	0.14
Oregon	14	0.02	0.34
Total	73,114	100.00	100.00

It is an interesting fact that Massachusetts, with only 3½ per cent. of the total population of the country, has over 23 per cent. of the total number of bondholders, while New York, with over 10 per cent. of the total population, has 20 per cent. of the bondholders. Ohio has over 6 per cent. of the total population and over 5½ per cent. of the bondholders. Illinois and New Hampshire each have over 4 per cent. of the bondholders, while the former has over 6 per cent. of the population of the country and the latter only 6-10 of 1 per cent. Oregon has the least number of holders, 14, and Massachusetts the highest, 16,855. Of the number of holders (73,114), 42,262 are males, 29,325 are females, and 1,527 are corporations, and of the amount held the males own $327,186,500, the females $90,353,850, and the corporations $227,451,550. The average per capita for the male holders is $7,741.84; for the female holders, $3,081.10; for the corporations, $148,953.20; and for both sexes and the corporations, $8,821.70. Of the $644,990,400, no less than $410,279,400 is held in amounts of over $50,000; $58,730,600 in amounts varying from $25,000 to $50,000; $59,143,850 in amounts exceeding $10,000 and reaching to $25,000; $41,079,900 in amounts exceeding $5,000 and reaching to $10,000; $33,070,950 in amounts exceeding $2,500 and reaching to $5,000; $22,032,550 in amounts of over $1,000 and including $2,500; $13,097,250 in amounts of over $500 and including $1,000, and $755,900 in amounts of less than $500.

The general conclusions, Mr. Porter says, are that, while over 36 per cent. of the holders reside in the New England States, not more than 11 per cent. of the aggregate of bonds are owned in New England. On the other hand, over 42 per cent. of the holders have their residence in the Middle States, and upward of 40 per cent. of the aggregate amount of bonds are held in that section; over 3½ per cent. of the holders reside in the Southern States, and about 2 per cent. of the bonds are owned there. In the Western States are 15 per cent. of the holders and nearly 8½ per cent. of the bonds. The banks and other corporations, representing in number only 2 per cent., own about 35 per cent. of the bonds.

An Interesting Bit of Unpublished History.

The following curious dispatches, never before printed (says a Washington telegram), were sent by Mr. Stanton to the Hon. Edwards Pierrepont about a month after the assassination of Mr. Lincoln. They are interesting as evidence of a very different phase of the excitement in Washington at that time from any which has been caused by the attempt on the life of President Garfield:

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 12, 1865.—10:05 p. m.

To the Hon. Edwards Pierrepont, New York:

I have written to-night to retain you and Cutting and Brady, or any one else you may desire to have associated with you, to prosecute Horace Greeley and the owners of the Tribune for Greeley's persistent efforts, the last four weeks, to incite assassins to finish their work of murdering me. Please give the matter your immediate attention on receiving the letter, and secure copies of all the Tribunes printed since the night of the President's murder, and get the names of the owners. I propose to prosecute criminally and also by civil suit, for I shall not allow them to have me murdered and escape responsibility without a struggle for life on my part.

EDWARD M. STANTON.

WAR DEPARTMENT, May 13—5:20 p. m.

The Hon. Edwards Pierrepont and the Hon. E. B. Cutting, New York:

I have proof of express personal malice against me by Greeley, and believe I can establish a combination between him and others which may end in accomplishing my death, as it did against Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Seward. This is my reason for distinguishing his case from others of general vituperation.

EDWIN M. STANTON.

The second telegram was sent in reply to one which contained an intimation that it might be indiscreet to make such an arrest as the one suggested by Mr. Stanton.

Circumstantial Evidence.

"My client sued a neighbor for the alleged killing of a favorite dog. The proof consisted in the mysterious disappearance of the animal, and the possession of a dog's skin by the defendant, which, after considerable argument, was brought into court in evidence. It was marked in a singular manner, and was positively identified, with many tears, by the plaintiff's wife and daughter as the undoubted integument of the deceased Bose. In summing up to the jury, I was in the midst of a highly-colored picture of the virtues of the deceased, and of the love of the children for their four-footed friend, when I was interrupted by a slight disturbance in the crowd near the door of the little school house which served as a court house. Looking around I saw my client's youngest son, a tow-headed urchin of 12, coming forward with a dog whose skin was the exact counterpart of the one put in evidence. The dog wagged his tail with good-natured composure, and the boy cried, in his childish treble, 'Paw, Bose has come home.' I gathered up my law books and retreated, and I have never had perfect confidence in circumstantial evidence since."—Editor's Drawer, in Harper's Magazine.

A Sad Story of a Wrecked Life.

The most thrilling and sadly suggestive temperance lecture is the sight of a once noble, talented man, left in ruins by intoxicating drink. A Washington paper tells of a ragged beggar, well known in the streets of that city, who once held an important command in the army, having been promoted for personal bravery, from a cavalry Lieutenant to nearly the highest rank in military service. One night, not long ago, when he had been too successful in begging liquor to sate his craving, and while lying helplessly drunk in the rear part of a Third street saloon, some men thought to play a joke on him by stealing his shirt, and proceeded to strip him.

Underneath his shirt, and suspended by a string from his neck, was a small canvas bag, which the men opened and found it contained his commission as Brevet Major General, two congratulatory letters—one from Gen. Grant and one from President Lincoln—a photograph of a little girl, and a curl of hair—a "chestnut shadow" that doubtless one day crept over the brow of some loved one.

When these things were discovered, even the half-drunken men who found them felt a respect for the man's former greatness, and pity for his fallen condition, and quietly returned the bag and its contents to where they found them, and replaced the sleeper's clothes upon him.

When a reporter tried to interview the man, and endeavored to learn something of his life in the past few years, he declined to communicate anything.

He cried like a child when told how his right name and former position were ascertained, and, with tears trickling down his cheeks, said:

"For God's sake, sir, don't publish my degradation, or my name, at least, if you are determined to say something about it. It is enough that I know myself how low I have become. Will you promise that much? It will do no good, but will do my friends a great deal of harm, as, unfortunately, they think I died in South America, where I went at the close of the war."

Intemperance and the gaming-table, he said, had wrought his ruin.

Preaching from Notes.

A certain minister of Scotland had a custom of writing the heads of his discourse on small slips of paper, which he placed on the Bible before him, to be used in succession. One day when he was explaining the second head, he got so excited in his discourse that he caused the ensuing slip to fall over the edge of the pulpit, though unperceived by himself. On reaching the end of his second head, he looked for the third slip; but, alas! it was not to be found. "Thirdly," he cried, looking around him with great anxiety. After a little pause, "Thirdly," again he exclaimed; but still no thirdly appeared. "Thirdly, I say, my brethren," pursued the bewildered clergyman; but not another word could he utter. At this point, while the congregation were partly sympathizing in his distress, and partly rejoicing in such a decisive instance of the impropriety of using notes in preaching—which has always been an unpopular thing in the Scotch clergy—an old woman rose up and thus addressed the preacher: "If I'm no mista'en, I saw thirdly flee out at the east window a quarter of an hour syne."

Meretricious Alms-Giving.

"If," says an English critic, "any cause or society wants funds, the machinery employed for collecting them should be sincere and simple. If money does not then come in, the inference is that the money is not wanted. Meretricious alms-giving is one of the scandals of the day."

AUBURN COURIER.

OHIO has 7,649 prisoners in her jails.

ACCORDING to the census of the year 1870 there were in the United States in that year 202 deaths by lightning, or twenty-five more than by yellow fever. This year the deaths by lightning show a heavy increase, many of the most remarkable cases having been reported.

SMOKERS will please take notice that a Judge in New York has just decided that a man has a right to punch a smoker in the ribs with the end of his umbrella if he "puffs the smoke of a bad cigar in his face, even if it is in a smoking-car." The man has his right to smoke, and the umbrella man has his right to punch, and the New York laws refuse to step in and say that either was wrong. The smoker, who sued, had to pay costs.

PATRICK HENRY was twice married and left fifteen children, and there are now living probably more than 100 of his descendants. William Wirt Henry, a member of the Richmond bar and Representative of that district in the State Senate, is his grandson. Senator Roane, of Virginia, was his grandson, and Gen. Joseph E. Johnston is his great-grand-nephew, as was also William C. Preston, the distinguished Senator in Congress from South Carolina.

IN the year ending June 1 twenty-eight deaf men were killed on the railroad tracks of the United States. In the same year two were shot for burglars while prowling around houses, and fourteen were run over by vehicles in the public streets. It is asserted on eminent medical authority that, while sadness usually accompanies blindness, obstinacy goes with deafness. When a deaf man will plod along on the railroad track, head down and eyes on the rails, he does more than most men with two good ears would attempt.

SUICIDE in Berlin is showing signs of increase, and investigations into the causes of it are on foot. On a single recent Saturday there were four cases and statistics for the three years between 1875 and 1878 place the city far ahead of London in the number of suicides, and at only a short distance behind Vienna. There were eighty-five such deaths to each 1,000,000 inhabitants in London during those years, and 285 in Vienna. For Berlin the proportion was 280 per 1,000,000. Leipsic shows the most alarming rate, it being greater even than the rate of Paris, at 450 per 1,000,000 inhabitants against 400 for Paris.

THE Hon. William Walter Phelps, Minister to Austria, lately had his first audience with the Emperor. Preceded by his jaeger, in cream-colored livery and headgear of white plumes, Mr. Phelps was escorted through many corridors and salons of the palace, the way lined with bowing lackeys. At last, in a lofty salon, destitute of furniture, he was presented to Francis Joseph, who was dressed in full uniform. Emperor and Minister exchanged courtly salutations, and then held a conversation in French—a conversation cordial and complimentary. Bows the most profound concluded the audience, and the Minister retired, as he had come, through the lanes of saluting attendants.

KING KALAKAUA, report says, is roaming up and down the earth looking for some guileless Prince or Princess upon whom he may unload the Sandwich islands. The population of the kingdom is now estimated at only 56,000, of which one-tenth is foreign. Capt. Cook in 1779 thought the Sandwich islands had a population of 400,000, but this was a mere guess. In 1823 the number of inhabitants was estimated at 142,000, and in 1853 at 73,138. Ten years ago it was 56,899, and is even less now. The revenue of the kingdom is only about $500,000, of which one-half is consumed in the payment of salaries. The debt is $800,000, and there is a pretty constant deficit. On the whole, it isn't surprising that King "Calico" should be anxious to sell out.

DURING a severe thunder-storm at Evansville a telegraph operator named Hengseler was struck by lightning and killed. THE $200,000 in bonds issued and indorsed by the city of Jeffersonville to aid in the construction of a bridge across the Ohio at that point, were recently canceled and destroyed by the trustees in the presence of the Council Finance Committee, the Mayor and city officers. ALEXANDER FOX was serving a two-year sentence in the State Prison South for forgery, when he made the acquaintance of Mr. Isaacs, the superintendent of the Goldman Boot and Shoe Company. Fox got into the confidence of Mr. Goldman, proprietor, and as soon as his term of imprisonment expired he was employed as shipping clerk. Everything went lovely until recently, when Fox jumped the town. It was discovered that he had forged checks for several small amounts, and sold cases of boots and shoes which the company knew nothing of.

The Republican Party.

The Republican party is this year unfortunate in its relations to various public questions. The elections in three States are likely to become interesting, and differing difficulties will beset the Republican party in each of these States, and in each of these States the embarrassments in the others will prove embarrassing. The three States whose elections will attract curiosity are Ohio, New York, Virginia. In Ohio the relations of the Republican campaign to the temperance advocates are not altogether lovely. The late Republican Legislature, aided by Gov. Foster, succeeded in alienating, probably, about 20,000 or 30,000 votes from the Republican party of Ohio. The Republican managers will reap the reward of insincerity, of hypocrisy, of unfair dealing. The plank in the Cleveland platform concerning this subject is an insult to all voters in Ohio who have convictions of any kind upon the temperance topics. It is cowardly, dishonest, a trick. It cannot win a liberal vote touching this subject. Placed alongside the behavior of the late Republican Legislature it will inevitably drive away many thousands of voters who have been in the habit of voting the Republican ticket.

The relations of the Republican campaign in Ohio to the subject of caste are not encouraging to that organization. The Republican managers have all along laid special stress upon this idea in relation to caste. They have ostentatiously denounced the spirit of caste. The greatest men of the Republican party made their fame by antagonizing the spirit of caste. But the Republican Convention at Cleveland insulted every Israelite in Ohio. It refused to nominate for the small position of Lieutenant Governor a gentleman thoroughly competent, honored in his own city and beyond it, for the sole reason that he was an Israelite. Verily, they will receive their reward.

The attitude of the Republican party toward public virtue at this moment is peculiarly unfortunate for it and for public virtue. The star route swindles, which will not be any too rapidly made known to the public—which would have been more rapidly and thoroughly made known had Democrats access to the books—have really caused some men to believe that "a change" would not be a national calamity. The hope of public virtue does not confidently rest in or upon the Republican organization.

If we look to Virginia we find that the Republican organization is become an ally and supporter of what it has vociferously called repudiation, and the alliance is not gratifying to Ohio Republicans. If we look to New York we find the Republican house divided against itself, and such a house can not stand. The greatest living men in the Republican party are hostile to this administration, opposed to the Republican organization as it is. These things are not unknown in Ohio, and naturally lead the friends of Democracy, of a better Government, of a change, to thank God and take courage like Paul at the Three Taverns. The preponderating probabilities are that the three States, named above, will all file notice upon the Republican machinery as now organized, and on the Republican methods as now known, that they are not liked.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

They Would Make Him an Elective King.

The moral which the Republican leaders and press have drawn from Guiteau's attempt to kill President Garfield is peculiarly worthy of attention.

It was, perhaps, to have been expected that Gen. Grant, who is a standing candidate for a third term of the Presidency, and is so far forth a standing menace to liberty and constitutional order, should improve the occasion to suggest changes of an imperialistic character. He has never appreciated the principles upon which our institutions are founded, and he very naturally turns to force, which he would wish to have substantially irresponsible, as the remedy for every evil, whether inherent or accidental, which the working of the system may disclose.

But Mr. Conkling is another sort of man. He is neither the blind creature nor the blind worshiper of organized force. He is a scholar and a lawyer; and political science, especially political science as successfully illustrated by our republican experiment, has been the study of his life. Yet Mr. Conkling has deliberately proposed that the whole theory of the Federal constitution be subverted by a law making assault upon the Chief Magistrate treason—in other words, a law which would make the President the state. It seems hardly possible that he was in earnest or that he appreciated the scope of his proposition. He spoke under very distressing circumstances, and, feeling the necessity of exhibiting a special horror of the crime of Guiteau, he may have said more than he meant; and, if he stood alone in the inclination expressed, we should look to see him correct himself at some future and calmer moment.

But others have been as swift and as extreme as Mr. Conkling, including his political chief and many powerful Republican journals of both wings of the party. Some, like Grant and Conkling, wish the President to be made an elective King, to compass or imagine whose death shall be treason. Others desire to have him surrounded by a body guard, and to move about with perpetual magnificence. Others still would have the entire administration, at least so far as appointment to office is concerned, committed to a Ministry, as in England, to be followed, of course, by the maxim that the President can do no wrong, because he has no direct responsibility.

But even these notions, unrepublican as they are, do not form the worst features of the discussion. From one end of the line to the other, the administration newspapers have raised a concerted howl that the attempted murder was the natural and inevitable consequence of the stalwart arraignment of the President for what they considered abuses of his power. This, if it means anything more than mere brutal spite, means that the liberty of controversy ought to be abridged; that the President must be placed beyond criticism; and that the infamous Sedition law, which disgraced and ruined the administration of John Adams, ought to be revived and enforced in our day.

In short, all these measures or suggestions of measures tend toward the separation of the President from the people and his identification with the state. Instead of a public servant, with a few limited and defined functions, accountable to public opinion and to the representatives of the people, they would make of him a great personage, distinguishable from other sovereigns only by the circumstance that the tenure of his office would be theoretically terminated at the expiration of certain periods.

Is it not about time to stop the flow of this monarchical nonsense?—New York Sun.

Perils of Ridicule.

I know of no principle which it is of more importance to fix in the minds of young people than that of the most determined resistance to the encroachment of ridicule. Give up to the world, and to the ridicule with which the world enforces its dominion, every trifling question of manner and appearance; it is to toss courage and firmness to the winds, to combat with the mass upon such subjects as these. But learn from the earliest days to insure your principles against the perils of ridicule; you can no more exercise your reason, if you live in the constant dread of laughter, than you can enjoy your life, if you are in the constant dread of death. If you think it right to differ from the times, and to make a stand for any valuable point of morals, do it, however rustic, however antique, however pedantic it may appear, do it, not for insolence, but seriously and grandly—as a man who wore a soul of his own in his bosom, and did not wait until it was breathed into him by the breath of fashion.

Let men call you mean, you know you are just; hypocritical, if you are honestly religious; pusillanimous, if you feel that you are firm; resistance soon converts unprincipled wit into sincere respect; and no aftertime can tear from you those feelings which every man carries with him who has made a noble and successful exertion in a virtuous cause. —Sidney Smith.

Rich Find in a Trunk.

A young fellow who was one of the "reserve" was ordered to Rouen last year to serve the usual fourteen days. He had no trunk. His funds were low. He asked a maiden aunt to lend him a trunk. She had nothing but an old-fashioned portmanteau, which was so queer he refused to take it. He could, however, find no other, and, ashamed as he was to be seen in such company, there was no help for it, shoulder it he was obliged to do. Offered employment in Rouen, he made it his home. The trunk lay hidden and forgotten in a dark closet, until one day while rummaging he came upon it. He determined to send it back to his aunt. As he emptied it he found it had a double bottom; he opened this double bottom; he found in it $16,000. He carried them to the bank and found the money good. He capered for joy, not only with his legs but with his tongue; so news of the discovery reached his aunt's ears, and she said the money belonged to her, and she found the junk dealer who had sold her the trunk; he willingly became her witness to this fact, but added: "Zat drunk ees my righds and zat monish ees mine." So they have all gone to law.—Paris Correspondence New Orleans Picayune.

A Ghost Car.

Says a San Francisco paper: "The Express Company frequently carries corpses over the Central Pacific Railroad, and until recently the messengers paid no more attention to a 'bone box' than to a sack of potatoes. But it is different now. One of the express cars, which was noted as having been the conveyance of more occupied coffins than any other on the line, a short time since was the scene of most unaccountable movements. The employes credit the mysterious effects to supernatural causes, and the messengers unite in saying that they would rather be discharged than run another trip in what they call 'the haunted car.'"

Nature's Toilette.

"Who has seen Nature getting up 'i the morning? She sleeps a' night in her claes, yet they're never rumpled! her awakening face she turns up, dewy, to the sun, and Zephyr wipes it wi' his wing, without disturbin' its dreamy expression. Never ye see her hair in papers; for, crisp and curly, far-streamin' and wide-wavin' are her locks, as alternate shadows and sunbeams dancin' o' some joyous river, rollin awa' to the far-off sea. Her e'e is heaven—her brow the marbled clouds, ane after a lang doon doon-gazing, serene and spiritual look o' herself, breathin' her orison-prayers, in the reflectin' magic o' some inland ocean, stately steps she frae the east!"

PROVED A SUCCESS BY YEARS OF USE!

THE PASTILLE
Prof. Harris' Radical Cure
Trade Mark
FOR
NERVOUS DEBILITY

A valuable Discovery and New Departure in Medical Science. A positively effective Remedy for the speedy and permanent Cure for organic weakness—the deplorable disease resulting from indiscreet practices or excesses in youth or at any time of life—by the only true way, viz: Direct Application acting by Absorption, and exerting its specific influence on the Vesicles, Ducts, and Gland, that are unable to perform their natural functions while this disease pervades the human organism. The use of the Pastille is attended with no pain or inconvenience, and does not interfere with the ordinary pursuits of life; it is quickly dissolved and soon absorbed, producing an immediate soothing and restorative effect upon the nervous organizations wrecked from vicious habits or excesses, stopping the drain from the system, restoring the mind to health and sound memory, removing the Dimness of Sight, Confusion of Ideas, Aversion to Society, etc., etc., and the appearance of premature old age usually accompanying this trouble, and restoring the vital forces, where they have been dormant for years. This mode of treatment has stood the test in very severe cases, and is now a pronounced success. Drugs are too much prescribed in this trouble, and, as many can bear witness to, with but little if any permanent good. There is no nonsense about this Preparation. Practical observation enables us to positively guarantee that it will give satisfaction. It has been in general use for several years and we have thousands of testimonials from patients, as to its value, and it is now conceded to be the most rational means yet discovered for reaching and curing this very prevalent trouble, that is well known to be the cause of untold misery to so many, and upon whom quacks prey with their useless nostrums and big fees. The Remedy is put up in neat boxes, of three sizes. No. 1, (enough to last a month,) $3; No. 2, (sufficient to effect a permanent cure, unless in severe cases,) $5; No. 3, (lasting over three months, will restore those in the worst condition,) $7. Sent by mail, in plain wrappers. Full DIRECTIONS for using will accompany EACH BOX.

Send for Sealed Descriptive Pamphlets giving Anatomical Illustrations and Testimony, which will convince the most skeptical that they can be restored to perfect health, and the vital forces thoro'ly re-established same as if never affected. Sold ONLY by Cephrenes, the Second Pyramid.

Of the many wondrous discoveries made by Belzoni, perhaps none was more note-worthy than that of the entrance to Cephrenes, the second of the mighty pyramids of Ghiza—those huge structures which for countless ages have bid defiance to time; vast, solitary and grand. Seated during his travels at the foot of this seconed pyramid, Belzoni mused as to the probability of there being an entrance to its interior, arguing that it was highly improbable that such a magnificent structure should have been reared without containing chambers and a means of entrance thereto. He knew that the first pyramid had been explored, but every historical account, from those of Herodotus downward, joined in declaring the second pyramid, at whose foot he mused, to be one huge monumental blank. But Belzoni was of too inquiring a mind to be satisfied, and, carefully examining the interior he at length came to the conclusion that there must be a way to the interior, and set himself boldly to the discovery. The first step to be taken was to obtain permission from the Bey, and that accorded he collected sixty workmen, and set them to break with their hatchets through a heap, of debris joined together by the pulverized mortar that had fallen from far up the side of the pyramid, and then been moistened by the heavy night dews.

A long period of toil then following, ending in the discovery of a cavity in the side, but no means of entrance. Disappointed but not daunted, Belzoni again surveyed the vast building, and determined to try in another spot, where, after the labor of many days, first one and then another block of granite was uncovered, and at last the entrance to the pyramid reached—a low passage choked up with fallen stones which required arduous toil to draw them out. But in spite of the opposition and idleness of his Arab laborers, Belzoni persevered, till a passage large enough to admit one of the men was cleared, and soon after, armed with a torch; the traveler stepped in, and began to look for the reward of his thirty days of incessant labor.

His light burned dimly in the gloomy echoing passage leading to the vast solitudes that had not been invaded for perhaps two thousand years, and it was with a strange feeling of awe that this enterprising man passed on, breathing the dust of a vast antiquity, and with lifted torch trying to pierce the gloom. Passage after passage he explored through the huge rock-built structure; peering anxiously forward lest he should be plunged unawares into some deep pit yawning to engulf him; but he passed on in safety until he reached a door, evidently leading into some great chamber, and then, stepping boldly forward, he stood in the centre of the huge building, trying to pierce the darkness around, and gazing wonderfully at this mausoleum of an antiquity so great that human history gives but a poor clue to its age. His steps echoed upon the stony floor, and seemed to die away in strange wisperings from the sides of the great tomb as he eargerly explored it, now with lowered torch, now with it elevated towards the roof, and listened again and again to some sound, to break the dead like stillness of the place.

The contents proved to be a large sarcophagus of granite; but far from satisfied with this result of his research, Belzoni sought on, and explored passage after passage, and echoing gloomy chambers, evidently formed to be the last resting-places of the kings of some ancient dynasty; but the grandeur of this solemn temple of the dead seemed to lie in its vast solidity and massiveness of construction, qualities which have been the admiration of travelers of every country. Oppressed at length by the strange stifling air of the place, Belzoni returned to the light of day once more, but only to recruit himself, and then, better provided with lights, to return through the long passages, and explore once more the many chambers, which brought to his mind visions of the past grandeur of Egypt, and the scenes that had been enacted upon earth when the pyramid was first declared by its architect complete.

Be Wise and Happy.

If you will stop all your extravagant and wrong notions in doctoring yourself and families with expensive doctors or humbug cure-alls, that do harm always, and use only nature's simple remedies for all your ailments—you will be wise, well and happy, and save great expense. The greatest remedy for this, the great, wise and good will tell you is Hop Bitters—rely on it. See another column.—Press. 31-2t.

No Good Preaching.

No man can do a good job of work, preach a good sermon, try a law suit well, doctor a patient or write a good article when he feels miserable and dull, with sluggish brain and unsteady nerves, and none should make the attempt in such a condition when it can be so easily and cheaply removed by a little Hop Bitters. See other column.—[Albany Times. 31-2t.

An Extinct Race With Skulls Three Feet in Length.

The Durango Record says:—The following extracts from a letter received by Mr. Charles Newman, of this place, will be found of great interest, detailing as they do the discovery of the most remarkable prehistoric remains ever yet unearthed. That "there were giants in those days" can no longer be doubted, a skull measuring three feet in length testifying to their existence among the prehistoric people who once inhabited the valley of the San Juan river. Mr. Newman reports the writer of the letter, Mr. Carpenter to be a reliable man, and he will avail himself of his offer and take charge of the remains, which will be removed to Durango at an early day.

Farmington is situated about fifty miles south of Durango, at the confluence of the Animas and San Juan rivers, and the discovery was made within three miles of town. The following is the letter detailing the particulars of the discovery:

FARMINGTON, N. M., March 2, 1881.

Charles Newman, esq.; Dear Sir:

* * * I found yesterday the tomb of an Indian, whom I think, by the very thick skull, to have been a man. The skull was, by measure, three feet long by two feet wide. It was walled in by a mud wall on the east and north, and by the stone wall of the room on the other sides. The head of the skeleton was toward the north. The legs had been doubled upon the chest. The bones were thick but short, and so far decayed that on being taken out they crumbled to pieces, except those of the vertebræ and the bones of the leg. In juxtaposition with the left side of the body, opposite the elbow, were two stone vessels, one a black, scaly, oblong body, with convex bottom and flaring edge at the mouth, and would hold about a half a gallon. The other is a highly painted, in fact artistically finished, mug or cup, with handle on one side, though the latter was broken in the center; otherwise the cup is in good preservation. It measures four inches high, three and a quarter inches at the top and four and a quarter inches at the base. This cup contained wheat, which though decayed and white, is readily recognized by the most careless observer. The other vessel probably contained water, as I could not find anything else but sand and dirt, with which it was filled.

After cleaning everything out of the tomb I dug through the mud wall, which was about eight inches thick, when I found several flat rocks, two of them being mill-stones for grinding grain. They are about twelve inches long, four inches wide and one inch thick. One side is slightly oval, the other flat. After uncovering several other flat sand rocks, I exposed an empty vessel, which was sunk down so that the top would be on a level with the dead Indian. It was walled in with mud to the top, which was covered with the flat rock I just mentioned. It was probably filled with water, which had evaporated centuries ago, as it was clean and free from all sand or debris. After an hour's hard work I succeeded in extricating it, when I found it was cracked in several places. It will hold seven or eight gallons. This was on the east side or rather on the left of the body. On continuing my explorations through the mud walls, I found another vessel of the same kind, but a little smaller, at the head of the body, about one-third full of meal, of which I have saved about a quart. It is in color of a whitish brown to a dark-brown color, and very light in weight. This vessel was cracked and some pieces broken off the top, so I did not take it out. I should have mentioned before that above this was a stone hammer not unlike a miner's eight-pound hammer, except that it had a ring cut around the center instead of an eye; also close to this was a stone ax, sharpened at one end and round at the other, with a ring cut around it. This completed the Indian's outfit, except about a peck of wheat that was in a layer three or four inches deep to the left of the last vessel and covering a space two feet wide by three feet long. There was a stone wall running east and west immediately outside the last vessel and wheat.

Continuing my work to the east I found a circular opening filled with loose dirt and rocks which I shoveled out and while doing so I found numerous small bones, most of which were of birds about the size of hens. I will state here that in excavating one of their walled cellars at another place some time last month, I found the bone of a large turkey with a spur on it an inch long.

When down about five feet in a circular hole I found three more mill-stones and a pot that will hold a little more than a quart, also a bowl three inches in height, six and three-quarter inches across the top and oval at the bottom. It is highly ornamented with paint inside while the outside has a few stripes. Going down a little further I found two sets of vessels, of two each, the groups being separated from each other by a space of about fifteen inches. One set consisted of a bowl very similar to the one just described, except differently ornamented and without a break or crack, and in shape and size like the one found and described with the body. The other set consisted of a small bowl or dish, striped inside, one and a half inches in height and three and a fourth inches across the top and another bowl twice as large and plain.

Further down I found the skeleton of a woman. The skull and jaw attached with sound teeth was found and all in a good state of preservation. I also found the skull and jaw of a child five or six years of age, to judge by the teeth.

Mistaken Identity.

Mr. Biggs was sauntering around the Union depot as the evening train came in from Buffalo, when he was surprised with:

"Why, Biggs! how are you, old fellow?"

"Well, if it ain't Jack Duncan! Glad to see you. Come right along home with me."

"No, Biggs; I'm too dirty. Been snowed in on the road; helped shovel snow, slept in a bar-room; havn't had a change of shirts for a week."

"Never mind appearances, nobody at the house. My wife took the 3 p. m. for an all night with her sister in Painesville. I'll furnish a shirt, and I have a fine bathing-room in the house. Come, now; you havn't honored me since I married."

"Well, since the wife is away, I'l surrender. We'll have a regular rooster night of it."

"Here's the linen," showing him into the bath-room a few minutes later. "There's the bath all ready. Now shape up while I go to Joe Richards' and order up one of our old college lunches. Nobody in the house; so just splash around at pleasure."

Biggs departed, leaving the door ajar. Jack did not notice it in his eagerness for immersion.

He had just tumbled out and resumed his pantaloons, when he heard footsteps approaching the door. Thinking it was Biggs returning, he seized the freshly laundried shirt, opening at the back, and jammed his head into it. It came down over his face, completely blindfolding him, and the starch baffled his efforts to tunnel through.

Just as he commenced straddling around with suspenders dangling, he heard a rustle that congealed his blood. The door squeaked, and a cheery voice said:

"Now I've got you, Mr. Biggs. The train left me, so I made a call or two and came back. I heard you playing sea lion in the bath-room as I entered the house; I got the buggy whip and slipped up to pay you back for everlastingly teasing me. Now, I'm ring master, dear hubby. Move lively." And she propped her whip in a business way that suspended the bachelor's animation. The shirt hid his face, and taking his silence for a spousal submission to the joke, she began:

"Gentlemen and ladies: Mademoiselle Biggs, queen of the sawdust arena, will now introduce her handsome and perfectly trained trick mule, Hubby Darling. He will walk in the arena on his hind feet with his head and fore-paws shrouded in a linen canopy. Come, now, Hubby! Hoop la! hoop la!"

She chirped, fetching him a wipe with the whip that made his bare feet spank the floor like a clog dancer.

"Limber up, Hubby! Lively now. Up, up, UP," and she underscored the last "up" with a briar cut, making Hubby Darling skip so impulsively that darling's suspenders swished about like a donkey's tail, and his hands dove instinctively to the preservation of his unstayed pantaloons.

"I blindfold Hubby Darling to prevent him climbing the center-pole. He's the trickiest donkey that cavorts the magic circle. The peerless prince of the canvas pavilion. Hoop la! (Zip she takes him). What beautiful action! Yet, fellow-countrymen, I never curry him down with anything but this silk blossomed snapper. Hoop la! (Popkerslash.)

I cover his ears that he may not offend the most fastidious; they resemble a cross between a mail bag and the human appendage. Hoop la! (Zip, zip.) Let the Golden Cornet band dish up Fisher's Hornpipe red-hot and highly flavored, and Hubby Darling shall——"

"B-b-beg your p-pardon, m-madam," sputtered the victim, as his head and voice shot out of the shirt. Then——

She started, stopped
Spell-bound, amazed;
The whip she dropped,
And then she raised
A Cherokee shriek
And down she flopped.

But the terrified sufferer caught her gallantly in his arms, just as Biggs rushed in with—

"Jack, are you drowning? Great heavens! my wife!"

"Explain yourself instantly, sir! You half dressed, my wife in your arms!" and he bristled all over, like a barbed wire fence.

"Hold on, Biggs; I've got about all I can stand. Let me get my clothes on, and I'll go where men are not martyrs. Your wife thought I was——

"Hear that, sir! What's this about blindfold?"

"I got stuck in that confounded shirt. Your wife took me for——"

"Merciful heavens! Hear that raving! You've dethroned my wife's reason. Oh, base, ingrate! Don't leave this house at the peril of your life. You shall——"

"My poor wife! I will avenge your wrongs," groaned Biggs, chafing her limbs agonizingly.

"My head was fast in the shirt. She couldn't see my face and thought it was you," shrieked the tortured man, hoarsely.

"Very likely! Be a man sir. Don't shrink from the punishment of your treachery!"

What has this villain done?" demanded Biggs fiercely.

She hitched on at once.

"Oh, mercy! It is no dream. He did nothing. Take me to my room. Oh, husband, how could you be so careless?"

"Don't go, Jack; maybe I've made a zebra of myself; stay now till the fog rises." And he bore his wilted wife away.

An hour later they sat around a marvelous supper—Biggs made a second trip to order. They held their sides and shrieked, and repeated the points of the episode, again and again.

Stray Cars.

A paragraph in an Eastern paper gives what purports to be the history of a railway freight car, which has been from Boston to Galveston once, from New York to Denver four times, from New York to New Orleans twice, besides numerous short trips to and from intermediate points. The man who is not familiar with railroad management is always puzzled in wondering how the stray cars that make such long journeys ever get home, but the system of exchanging receipts is simple, and every railroad has a man whose business it is to know just where every car belonging to the line is. When a car is lost, as is often the case, a tracer is sent to find it. Some of the trunk lines keep men out all the time tracing their cars and sending them home. This unbroken inter-state transportation is the result of a law drafted by the Hon. James F. Wilson, of Iowa, and introduced by him into congress, where it was enacted in 1866. Some of the railroad companies objected, for various reasons, but many of them were favorable. Mr. Wilson argued that public commercial policy demanded transportation for passengers and freight from one state to another without chan or delays, breaking of bulk and attendant wastage and loss of and that it was the duty of c to facilitate commerce. that the wisdom of the la justified as it has bee Inter-Ocean.

Making Watches.

Defective Watch Cases are one of the chief causes of so many watches not being good time pieces. The cases being thin and not fitting well, admit dust and dirt to the movement, which soon interferes with the running parts of the watch, necessitating cleaning, repairing, etc., and the amount thus paid out, if applied toward buying a good case in the beginning, would have saved all this trouble and expense. We have recently seen a case that meets all these requirements, it having been carried for over twenty years and still remains perfect. We refer to the JAS. BOSS' PATENT STIFFENED GOLD CASE, which has become one of the staple articles of the Jewelery trade, possessing as it does, so many advantages over all other watch cases, being made of two heavy plates of solid gold over a plate of composition, and we advise all our readers to ask their Jeweler for a card or catalogue that will explain the manner in which they are made.

It is the only STIFFENED CASE made with two plates of gold, seamless pendants, and center, solid joints, crown pieces, etc., all of which are covered by letters patent. Therefore buy no case before consulting a Jeweler who keeps the JAS. BOSS' PATENT STIFFENED GOLD CASE, that you may learn the difference between it and all imitations that claim to be equally as good.

For sale by Abright the Jeweler. Ask to see the warrant that accompanies each case, and don't be persuaded that any other make of case is as good.

Cephrenes. the Second Pyramid.

Of the many wondrous discoveries made by Belzoni, perhaps none was more note-worthy than that of the entrance to Cephrenes, the second of the mighty pyramids of Ghiza—those huge structures which for countless ages have bid defiance to time; vast, solitary and grand. Seated during his travels at the foot of this secoued pyramid, Belzoni mused as to the probability of there being an entrance to its interior, arguing that it was highly improbable that such a magnificent structure should have been reared without containing chambers and a means of entrance thereto. He knew that the first pyramid had been explored, but every historical account, from those of Herodotus downward, joined in declaring the second pyramid, at whose foot he mused, to be one huge monumental blank. But Belzoni was of too inquiring a mind to be satisfied, and, carefully examining the interior, he at length came to the conclusion that there must be a way to the interior, and set himself boldly to the discovery. The first step to be taken was to obtain permission from the Bey, and that accorded he collected sixty workmen, and set them to break with their hatchets through a heap of debris joined together by the pulverized mortar that had fallen from far up the side of the pyramid, and then been moistened by the heavy night dews.

A long period of toil then following, ending in the discovery of a cavity in the side, but no means of entrance. Disappointed but not daunted, Belzoni again surveyed the vast building, and determined to try in another spot, where, after the labor of many days, first one and then another block of granite was uncovered, and at last the entrance to the pyramid reached—a low passage choked up with fallen stones which required arduous toil to draw them out. But in spite of the opposition and idleness of his Arab laborers, Belzoni persevered, till a passage large enough to admit one of the men was cleared, and soon after, armed with a torch; the traveler stepped in, and began to look for the reward of his thirty days of incessant labor.

His light burned dimly in the gloomy echoing passage leading to the vast solitudes that had not been invaded for perhaps two thousand years, and it was with a strange feeling of awe that this enterprising man passed on, breathing the dust of a vast antiquity, and with lifted torch trying to pierce the gloom. Passage after passage he explored through the huge rock-built structure; peering anxiously forward lest he should be plunged unawares into some deep pit yawning to engulf him; but he passed on in safety until he reached a door, evidently leading into some great chamber, and then, stepping boldly forward, he stood in the centre of the huge building, trying to pierce the darkness around, and gazing wonderfully at this mausoleum of an antiquity so great that human history gives but a poor clue to its age. His steps echoed upon the stony floor, and seemed to die away in strange wisperings from the sides of the great tomb as he eargerly explored it, now with lowered torch, now with it elevated towards the roof, and listened again and again to some sound, to break the dead like stillness of the place.

The contents proved to be a large sarcophagus of granite; but far from satisfied with this result of his research, Belzoni sought on, and explored passage after passage, and echoing gloomy chambers, evidently formed to be the last resting-places of the kings of some ancient dynasty; but the grandeur of this solemn temple of the dead seemed to lie in its vast solidity and massiveness of construction, qualities which have been the admiration of travelers of every country. Oppressed at length by the strange stifling air of the place, Belzoni returned to the light of day once more, but only to recruit himself, and then, better provided with lights, to return through the long passages, and explore once more the many chambers, which brought to his mind visions of the past grandeur of Egypt, and the scenes that had been enacted upon earth when the pyramid was first declared by its architect complete.

Be Wise and Happy.

If you will stop all your extravagant and wrong notions in doctoring yourself and families with expensive doctors or humbug cure-alls, that do harm always, and use only nature's simple remedies for all your ailments—you will be wise, well and happy, and save great expense. The greatest remedy for this, the great, wise and good will tell you is Hop Bitters—rely on it. See another column.—Press. 31-2t.

No Good Preaching.

No man can do a good job of work, preach a good sermon, try a law suit well, doctor a patient or write a good article when he feels miserable and dull, with sluggish brain and unsteady nerves, and none should make the attempt in such a condition when it can be so easily and cheaply removed by a little Hop Bitters. See other column.—[Albany Times. 31-2t.

An Extinct Race With Skulls Three Feet in Length.

The Durango Record says:—The following extracts from a letter received by Mr. Charles Newman, of this place, will be found of great interest, detailing as they do the discovery of the most remarkable prehistoric remains ever yet unearthed. That "there were giants in those days" can no longer be doubted, a skull measuring three feet in length testifying to their existence among the prehistoric people who once inhabited the valley of the San Juan river. Mr. Newman reports the writer of the letter, Mr. Carpenter to be a reliable man, and he will avail himself of his offer and take charge of the remains, which will be removed to Durango at an early day.

Farmington is situated about fifty miles south of Durango, at the confluence of the Animas and San Juan rivers, and the discovery was made within three miles of town. The following is the letter detailing the particulars of the discovery:

FARMINGTON, N. M., March 2, 1881.

Charles Newman, esq.; Dear Sir:

* * * I found yesterday the tomb of an Indian, whom I think, by the very thick skull, to have been a man. The skull was, by measure, three feet long by two feet wide. It was walled in by a mud wall on the east and north, and by the stone wall of the room on the other sides. The head of the skeleton was toward the north. The legs had been doubled upon the chest. The bones were thick but short, and so far decayed that on being taken out they crumbled to pieces, except those of the vertebræ and the bones of the leg. In juxtaposition with the left side of the body, opposite the elbow, were two stone vessels, one a black, scaly, oblong body, with convex bottom and flaring edge at the mouth, and would hold about a half a gallon. The other is a highly painted, in fact artistically finished, mug or cup, with handle on one side, though the latter was broken in the center; otherwise the cup is in good preservation. It measures four inches high, three and a quarter inches at the top and four and a quarter inches at the base. This cup contained wheat, which though decayed and white, is readily recognized by the most careless observer. The other vessel probably contained water, as I could not find anything else but sand and dirt, with which it was filled.

After cleaning everything out of the tomb I dug through the mud wall, which was about eight inches thick, when I found several flat rocks, two of them being mill-stones for grinding grain. They are about twelve inches long, four inches wide and one inch thick. One side is slightly oval, the other flat. After uncovering several other flat sand rocks, I exposed an empty vessel, which was sunk down so that the top would be on a level with the dead Indian. It was walled in with mud to the top, which was covered with the flat rock I just mentioned. It was probably filled with water, which had evaporated centuries ago, as it was clean and free from all sand or debris. After an hour's hard work I succeeded in extricating it, when I found it was cracked in several places. It will hold seven or eight gallons. This was on the east side or rather on the left of the body. On continuing my explorations through the mud walls, I found another vessel of the same kind, but a little smaller, at the head of the body, about one-third full of meal, of which I have saved about a quart. It is in color of a whitish brown to a dark-brown color, and very light in weight. This vessel was cracked and some pieces broken off the top, so I did not take it out. I should have mentioned before that above this was a stone hammer not unlike a miner's eight-pound hammer, except that it had a ring cut around the center instead of an eye; also close to this was a stone ax, sharpened at one end and round at the other, with a ring cut around it. This completed the Indian's outfit, except about a peck of wheat that was in a layer three or four inches deep to the left of the last vessel and covering a space two feet wide by three feet long. There was a stone wall running east and west immediately outside the last vessel and wheat.

Continuing my work to the east I found a circular opening filled with loose dirt and rocks which I shoveled out and while doing so I found numerous small bones, most of which were of birds about the size of hens. I will state here that in excavating one of their walled cellars at another place some time last month, I found the bone of a large turkey with a spur on it an inch long.

When down about five feet in a circular hole I found three more millstones and a pot that will hold a little more than a quart, also a bowl three inches in height, six and three-quarter inches across the top and oval at the bottom. It is highly ornamented with paint inside while the outside has a few stripes. Going down a little further I found two sets of vessels, of two each, the groups being separated from each other by a space of about fifteen inches. One set consisted of a bowl very similar to the one just described, except differently ornamented and without a break or crack, and in shape and size like the one found and described with the body. The other set consisted of a small bowl or dish, striped inside, one and a half inches in height and three and a fourth inches across the top and another bowl twice as large and plain.

Further down I found the skeleton of a woman. The skull and jaw attached with sound teeth was found and all in a good state of preservation. I also found the skull and jaw of a child five or six years of age, to judge by the teeth.

Mistaken Identity.

Mr. Biggs was sauntering around the Union depot as the evening train came in from Buffalo, when he was surprised with:

"Why, Biggs! how are you, old fellow?"

"Well, if it ain't Jack Duncan! Glad to see you. Come right along home with me."

"No, Biggs; I'm too dirty. Been snowed in on the road; helped shovel snow, slept in a bar-room; havn't had a change of shirts for a week."

"Never mind appearances, nobody at the house. My wife took the 3 p. m. for an all night with her sister in Painesville. I'll furnish a shirt, and I have a fine bathing-room in the house. Come, now; you havn't honored me since I married."

"Well, since the wife is away, I'l surrender. We'll have a regular rooster night of it."

"Here's the linen," showing him into the bath-room a few minutes later. "There's the bath all ready. Now shape up while I go to Joe Richards' and order up one of our old college lunches. Nobody in the house; so just splash around at pleasure."

Biggs departed, leaving the door ajar. Jack did not notice it in his eagerness for immersion.

He had just tumbled out and resumed his pantaloons, when he heard footsteps approaching the door. Thinking it was Biggs returning, he seized the freshly laundried shirt, opening at the back, and jammed his head into it. It came down over his face, completely blindfolding him, and the starch baffled his efforts to tunnel through.

Just as he commenced straddling around with suspenders dangling, he heard a rustle that congealed his blood. The door squeaked, and a cheery voice said:

"Now I've got you, Mr. Biggs. The train left me, so I made a call or two and came back. I heard you playing sea lion in the bath-room as I entered the house; I got the buggy whip and slipped up to pay you back for everlastingly teasing me. Now, I'm ring master, dear hubby. Move lively." And she propped her whip in a business way that suspended the bachelor's animation. The shirt hid his face, and taking his silence for a spousal submission to the joke, she began:

"Gentlemen and ladies: Mademoiselle Biggs, queen of the sawdust arena, will now introduce her handsome and perfectly trained trick mule, Hubby Darling. He will walk in the arena on his hind feet with his head and forepaws shrouded in a linen canopy. Come, now, Hubby! Hoop-la! hoop la!"

She chirped, fetching him a wipe with the whip that made his bare feet spank the floor like a clog dancer.

"Limber up, Hubby! Lively now. Up, up, UP," and she underscored the last "up" with a briar cut, making Hubby Darling skip so impulsively that darling's suspenders swished about like a donkey's tail, and his hands dove instinctively to the preservation of his unstayed pantaloons.

"I blindfold Hubby Darling to prevent him climbing the center-pole. He's the trickiest donkey that cavorts the magic circle. The peerless prince of the canvas pavilion. Hoop la! (Zip she takes him). What beautiful action! Yet, fellow-countrymen, I never curry him down with anything but this silk blossomed snapper. Hoop la! (Popkeralash.)

I cover his ears that he may not offend the most fastidious; they resemble a cross between a mail bag and the human appendage. Hoop la! (Zip, zip.) Let the Golden Cornet band dish up Fisher's Hornpipe red-hot and highly flavored, and Hubby Darling shall——"

"B-b-beg your p-pardon, m-madam," sputtered the victim, as his head and voice shot out of the shirt. Then——

She started, stopped
Spell-bound, amazed;
The whip she dropped,
And then she raised
A Cherokee shriek
And down she flopped.

But the terrified sufferer caught her gallantly in his arms, just as Biggs rushed in with—

"Explain yourself instantly, sir! You half dressed, my wife in your arms!" and he bristled all over, like a barbed wire fence.

"Hold on, Biggs; I've got about all I can stand. Let me get my clothes on, and I'll go where men are not martyrs. Your wife thought I was——

"Hear that, sir! What's this about blindfold?"

"I got stuck in that confounded shirt. Your wife took me for——"

"Merciful heavens! Hear that raving! You've dethroned my wife's reason. Oh, base, ingrate! Don't leave this house at the peril of your life. You shall——"

"My poor wife! I will avenge your wrongs," groaned Biggs, chafing her limbs agonizingly.

"My head was fast in the shirt. She couldn't see my face and thought it was you," shrieked the tortured man, hoarsely.

"Very likely! Be a man sir. Don't shrink from the punishment of your treachery!"

What has this villain done?" demanded Biggs fiercely.

She hitched on at once.

"Oh, mercy! It is no dream. He did nothing. Take me to my room. Oh, husband, how could you be so careless?"

"Don't go, Jack; maybe I've made a zebra of myself; stay now till the fog rises." And he bore his wilted wife away.

An hour later they sat around a marvelous supper—Biggs made a second trip to order. They held their sides and shrieked, and repeated the points of the episode, again and again.

Stray Cars.

A paragraph in an Eastern paper gives what purports to be the history of a railway freight car, which has been from Boston to Galveston once, from New York to Denver four times, from New York to New Orleans twice, besides numerous short trips to and from intermediate points. The man who is not familiar with railroad management is always puzzled in wondering how the stray cars that make such long journeys ever get home, but the system of exchanging receipts is simple, and every railroad has a man whose business it is to know just where every car belonging to the line is. When a car is lost, as is often the case, a tracer is sent to find it. Some of the trunk lines keep men out all the time tracing their cars and sending them home. This unbroken inter-state transportation is the result of a law drafted by the Hon. James F. Wilson, of Iowa, and introduced by him into congress, where it was enacted in 1866. Some of the railroad companies objected, for various reasons, but many of them were favorable. Mr. Wilson argued that public commercial policy demanded transportation for passengers and freight from one state to another without chan or delays, breaking of bulk and attendant wastage and loss of and that it was the duty of c to facilitate commerce. that the wisdom of the la justified as it has bee Inter-Ocean.

Making Watches.

Defective Watch Cases are one of the chief causes of so many watches not being good time pieces. The cases being thin and not fitting well, admit dust and dirt to the movement, which soon interferes with the running parts of the watch, necessitating cleaning, repairing, etc., and the amount thus paid out, if applied toward buying a good case in the beginning, would have saved all this trouble and expense. We have recently seen a case that meets all these requirements, it having been carried for over twenty years and still remains perfect. We refer to the JAS. BOSS' PATENT STIFFENED GOLD CASE, which has become one of the staple articles of the Jewelery trade, possessing as it does, so many advantages over all other watch cases, being made of two heavy plates of solid gold over a plate of composition, and we advise all our readers to ask their Jeweler for a card or catalogue that will explain the manner in which they are made.

It is the only STIFFENED CASE made with two plates of gold, seamless pendants, and center, solid joints, crown pieces, etc., all of which are covered by letters patent. Therefore buy no case before consulting a Jeweler who keeps the JAS. BOSS' PATENT STIFFENED GOLD CASE, that you may learn the difference between it and all imitations that claim to be equally as good.

For sale by Abright the Jeweler. Ask to see the warrant that accompanies each case, and don't be persuaded that any other make of case is as good.

THE FARMER'S SEVENTY YEARS.

Ah! there he is, lad, at the plow;
He beats the boys for work,
And whatsoe'er the task might be
None ever saw him shirk.
And he can laugh, too, till his eyes
Run o'er with mirthful tears,
And sing full many an old-time song
In spite of seventy years.

"Good-morning, friends! 'tis 12 o'clock;
Time for a half-hour's rest."
And Farmer John took out his lunch
And ate it with a zest.
"A harder task it is," he said,
"Than following up these steers
Or mending fences, e'en for me
To feel my seventy years.

"You ask me why I feel so young;
I'm sure, friends, I can't tell,
But think it is my good wife's fault
Who kept me up so well;
For women such as she are scarce
In this poor vale of tears;
She's given me love, and hope and strength
For more than forty years.

"And then my boys have all done well,
As far as they have gone,
And that thing warms an old man's blood,
And helps him up and on.
My girls have never caused a pang,
Or raised up anxious fears;
Then wonder not that I feel young
And hale at seventy years.

"Why don't my good boys do my work
And let me sit and rest?
Ah, friends, that wouldn't do for me;
I like my own way best.
They have their duty; I have mine,
And till the end appears,
I mean to smell the soil, my friends,"
Said the man of seventy years.

THE LAST OF NINE.

"Did you know that Tom Bailey had passed in his checks?"

"Yes, heard it by telephone an hour ago."

The speaker was John McWilliams, and we were sitting on the piazza of his home in Bradford.

"Do you know the particulars, John?"

"Particulars? Well, I don't know as there are any. Same old story, you know. Didn't pack the nitro-glycerine in the wagon carefully, and when the wagon went over a log the load exploded and—and—that was all."

There was no need of further explanation, for I could reason it all out clearly enough, and could almost fancy I saw the ghastly remains of the ill-starred Tom Bailey, who went out one morning to superintend the shooting of a well and never came back. Bailey was an employe of the Roberts Torpedo Company, and John McWilliams, the man with whom I was in conversation, was his Division Superintendent on the same "run," or district.

"Family, John?"

"No—that is, he hadn't a wife, but he had a widowed mother and a young sister."

"What will they do?"

"Oh, the company won't see them starve, and, beside, I guess poor old Tom didn't die a beggar. Poor old boy!" and the bearded man at my side sobbed like a heart-broken child.

"I never told you about Tom and the rest of the boys, did I?" continued the sorrowing man.

"The rest?"

"Yes, there were nine of us, you know—but you don't know, for I have never told a living soul. This sudden death of Tom's quite unmans me, for I am now the only one left—the last of nine."

I waited a long while for John to gain control of his feelings, for I knew he had a story to tell of more than usual interest. It was a beautiful night, full of soft moonlight and drowsy with the hum of humanity in the city beneath our feet. A delicate, almost imperceptible mist hung about the city, and from our hillside piazza we could see far down the valley where the Tunungwant stream faintly glimmered in the moonlight, and where the huge iron tanks of oil loomed up gloomy and black against the mellow brightness of the night. Over at Prospect Park, on Mount Raub, the light was flashing and flaring, while faintly to our ears came the strains of a Strauss waltz. Away off on another hill the sound of a laboring engine and the thud of a walking-beam told that the ponderous drill at a well was being lowered into the earth as fast as men working night and day could sink the hole. Down below, the city flashed up at us its countless lights and shadows and faintly floated up the hum of business and pleasure. It was a strangely beautiful night for a story of oil. John spoke at last, slowly and with evident hesitation.

"Yes," he said, "there were nine of us, and I'm the last one alive. It's a queer thing, and it makes me feel very strangely; perhaps more so now that poor Tom is—is—"

He couldn't bring himself to say the word; he couldn't say that his friend was dead. With a great effort he continued:

"You doubtless know that I was in the army during the late war. I saw some pretty tough fighting, too, and after Shiloh I was made a Captain, and at the same time Tom Bailey, who was in the same company, was promoted to a Lieutenancy for bravery. He deserved it, too, for there never was a better or braver boy; a trifle reckless you might say, but brave and generous to a fault. At the close of the war we went home together, and with us went what was left of the company. There wasn't much, to be sure, for we had done some terrible fighting, and many of the boys had gone down through the valley of the shadow. Like the rest of the returned soldiers, we went into the oil country, which was just then turning the heads of the people, and after knocking around a while and losing what money we had we concluded to go into the business of shooting wells. Tom and I went into the business for ourselves, and soon hired four of the men who had been in our company and a friend of mine, who had been wealthy but was 'broke,' to work for us. Two fishermen came along that we had known before, and we engaged them. That made nine of us, and we used to live in one room and do all our own cooking, for women were scarce in the oil country at that time. Everything went along finely and we made money hand over fist. Old Col. Roberts hadn't got the monopoly of the nitro-glycerine business then, and any man could engage in it who cared to run the risk.

"Our crowd was extremely fortunate at first, and we were beginning to feel that nitro-glycerine wasn't such a terrible thing as some persons made out. Well, we worked along about six months without an accident, when one day one of our men was killed while taking glycerine from a wagon. This gave us considerable of a shock, but we laid the blame on the man's carelessness, and worked on as usual. Within a year three more of our men were blown to fragments at the same time through pure recklessness. None of these men drank liquor to excess; so you couldn't attribute their death to intoxication. The rest of us were mighty careful after that, and only stayed in the business because we could make money faster than at anything else. We didn't have any more accidents while we were doing business for ourselves, and we began to take courage.

"When the Roberts Company gained monopolistic control of the torpedo business the remaining five of our crowd went to work for them. Everything went on swimmingly for some time, but at last three of the crowd had some trouble, real or fancied, with the company, and the result was that the men quit entirely and went to moonlighting—shooting wells at night in defiance of the law giving the Roberts Company the monopoly. Moonlighting is just about twice as dangerous as torpedoing in the lawful way, and it wasn't long before those three fellows were blown skyward. I wasn't a bit surprised, for when a man gets down so low as to go into moonlighting when he can make good wages at a legitimate business, I naturally look to see his death announced before a great while in the papers.

"Well, that just left two—Tom Bailey and I—of the original nine that went into the business only a few years ago. One by one our boys have dropped off, until to-day I helped to bury what remained of poor Tom. Poor old boy, I know it wasn't his fault, for he was the most careful man I ever saw. There were nine of us when we started—all banded together to work for one another's interests—and now they are all gone but me, and I am—the—last—of nine."

His unsmoked cigar slipped from his nerveless fingers and fell to the ground. He trembled violently, as with ague, a nameless horror and fear looking out of his eyes into vacancy.

"John," said I, gently touching his arm, "come into the house; it is chilly out here."

"Yes, yes, let us go in. But stay—I—feel—so strangely. I never thought of it before, but if—my wife—should—should see me as I saw Tom Bailey to-day it would—it would—would kill her!" and the strong man sank into a chair, completely overpowered with the awful thought.

Business called me away from Bradford and the oil country the next day, and I did not return for some weeks. Having business at Smethport, the county seat of McKean county, I passed through that village and started for Bradford, by the way of the Bradford, Bordell and Kinzua railway. When within a few miles of Bradford an accident happened to the locomotive, which would delay the train several hours. Being anxious to reach the city as soon as possible, four of the passengers, including myself, started over the mountains afoot, hoping to reach our destination by 3 o'clock in the afternoon. We walked along quite briskly, and, while following the ridge of a mountain, were hailed by a voice which I recognized as belonging to the torpedo superintendent having in charge the district adjoining that of John McWilliams.

Curiously wondering what Smolley could want, we went toward him. Two or three men were leaning against the stump of a tree and merely nodded as we approached. Smolley was searching on the ground for something at some distance from his companions.

"What's the trouble, Smolley?" and as I spoke the glycerine man raised a pained-looking face and mutely pointed his finger in the direction of the men around the stump.

I looked and saw a strange sight. The wreck of an oil derrick and its machinery lay scattered over the ground in small pieces. In an instant it all came to me—there had been an explosion of nitro-glycerine. The derrick had been blown to atoms and scattered far and wide; the ponderous bull-wheels were dismantled and broken into a thousand fragments. On every hand was ruin such as only nitro-glycerine can produce. The thought came, was anybody hurt? I glanced inquiringly at the three men. One of them pointed silently at a small baking-powder box lying at their feet. I stepped forward.

"My God! John—John McWilliams?" and I would have fallen had not one of the men supported me.

The last of nine! I stood and looked down into a little wooden box filled with ghastly flesh and blood and bones—all that was mortal of noble-hearted John McWilliams. A side of the head and face remained as noble and handsome as in life, but what remained of the body could have been placed in a ten-quart pail. Smolley came and leaned his arm against my shoulder in silent sympathy.

"How did it happen, Smolley?" This after a long period of silence.

"The well made a heavy flow of gas and oil as John was lowering the torpedo, and when the shell came to the top of the hole John stood there and caught it in his hands, and as he turned to take the thing away it exploded in his hands with the result you see. There never was a more careful man than John."

For years and years John McWilliams had laughed at nitro-glycerine, and had toyed with it as with a shackled monster, but at last the monster, waiting patiently for years, had sprung upon him and avenged its wrongs. Sorrowfully we lifted the little box and carried it homeward. Along the mountain ridge we moved, a melancholy procession, and when on the summit of Mount Raub we rested and looked down on the clustered buildings of Bradford. In the glory of the afternoon sun even Bradford's homely buildings were beautiful, the city presenting the very picture of the loveliness of life, while over and beyond the hills, looking down in silent grandeur, were voiceless witnesses of God's immortality.

One of the passengers who had come with me from the train produced a powerful field-glass. Almost mechanically I turned and looked at John McWilliams' hillside home. A door was standing wide open, and a lace curtain streamed idly from a window. In through the open door I could see the tea-table set and waiting. On the lawn a handsome, graceful woman romped with two children, frequently shading her eyes with her hands and looking down the street long and earnestly. It was Mrs. McWilliams, and she was waiting and watching for the loving husband and father who would not come again on this earth, never, nevermore.

Slowly the sun crept behind the western hills, and, with aching hearts, we took up our burden again and prepared to descend into the city, my ears ringing with the words of the ill-fated John on that night many weeks before: "If my wife—should—should see me as I saw Tom Bailey to-day it would—it would—would kill her!"—Philadelphia Times.

How Uncle Sile Ran a Caucus.

When poor old Uncle Silas Patterson went to his grave not a mourner followed, and never will a tear moisten the earth above him. In by-gone days he aspired to be a political leader, and there are plenty of men who remember how he once ran a ward caucus. Knowing his ambition to become a power in the Third ward, three or four old jokers put up a plan to make him Chairman of the caucus shortly to be held, and they visited him in a body and explained:

"Everything will depend on how you run this caucus. Be calm. Be dignified. Don't let any one ride over you. One will move this and the other that, but you must refuse to entertain any motions until you have ascertained the pleasure of the meeting."

Uncle Sile was delighted and puffed up, and he could hardly wait for the hour which was to witness his triumph. He was called to the chair, as planned, and, after a few remarks to prove his gratitude, he called for order and said:

"Now, then, what is the pleasure of the meeting?"

A citizen rose in reply and began:

"I move you, Mr. Chairman, that we now pro——"

"Order! Order!" called Uncle Sile.

"I am in order."

"You are not! Take your seat or I'll have you put out."

The astonished elector dropped back to second fiddle, and Uncle Sile continued:

"Now, then, what is the pleasure of the meeting?"

"I move that we proceed to bal—"

It was another elector, and he had only got thus far when the Chairman cried out:

"I call for order. If we can't have order we might as well adjourn. I now ask you for the third time, What is the pleasure of the meeting?"

The electors were dumbfounded for a time, but one of them recovered a little sooner than the rest and asked:

"Is this a caucus?"

"You bet!" answered Uncle Sile.

"Are we here to nominate ward officers?"

"We are."

"Then, sir, I move that we pro—"

"Order! order!" yelled the Chairman. "That's the third or fourth time that trick has been tried here, and the next man who makes a motion before I have found out the pleasure of the meeting will be put out. Now, then, is there any pleasure in this meeting? If so, where is it and what is it?"

He soon discovered. About twenty men rushed for him at once, and he went out of the window like a bag of sand, and before he had come to the caucus had transacted its business and adjourned. The incident not only cured Uncle Sile's ambition to be a politician but it is doubtful if he ever cast another vote.—Detroit Free Press.

Advice on Training Horses.

Forty-six years ago David Lewis, then a handsome, round-headed Welshman, was driving from Utica, Oneida county, to Hamilton College, having a load of lads returning, after a spring vacation, to their studies. As he neared Middle Settlement his attention was called to a farmer maltreating a colt which could not and would not keep up in his work with an older horse harnessed beside it. David, displeased at the unreasonable farmer, murmured "Tu-ra-lu-ral" (but did not swear), and stopped for the farmer to come to the roadside, and the two commenced talking in Welsh. We college boys had no Welsh professor, and were ignorant of the language. The tongues of David and his countryman had a short spat. As we started on our way I asked for a translation of the Welsh dialogue. Says David:

"The man asked me to tell him how to break his colt, and I told him to go into the house and first break himself."

No man can master a colt properly who can not control himself. There is no mystery in education. The whole method is according to law. Rewards and punishments underlie just government. Beware of an improper punishment of a colt as you would of a human being, for you must command respect if you would educate either. Never trifle or deceive. When you must draw the whip to compel attention, remember to reward obedience with sugar, or some pleasing gift. First make your colt your friend, and then educate without impatience or severity. Condescend to talk to your horse and be clear in your language, for he can hear and is glad to be coolly and intelligently directed. "Go on! Steady! Whoa!" are three magic words which should be used to start, to moderate, or to stop the movements of a colt. Repeat them clearly, as you have occasion to use them, for just what they mean, and the colt will soon obey them, and be proud of his knowledge. Be at all times considerate, kind, fair and firm, remembering there is a limit to every sensitive organization. It does no harm to tire a colt, but never exhaust one. Groom well after work rather than before. If you hate a colt, let some one else educate him.—Brentano's Monthly.

"GATH" says that a public man at Long Branch told him that when Zach Chandler heard of the nomination of Lincoln in 1860, he began to curse in a terrible manner, and said that Lincoln was a miserable clown, and that Seward was the only man in the country fit to be elected and who could have carried it. Somebody spoke up at the telegraph office, where this talk was going on, and said, "You underate Mr. Lincoln; he is a man of intellect; a fine lawyer; an excellent debater, and a man of decision of character and firmness of purpose." In about fifteen minutes of such talk as this, Zach was induced to send a message to Lincoln congratulating him.

IT is not till the bloom of fancy begins to fade that the heart ripens to the passion that the bloom precedes and foretells.

THE FAMILY DOCTOR.

TO CURE chilblains, slice raw potatoes with the skins on, and sprinkle over them a little salt, and, as soon as the liquid therefrom settles in the bottom of the dish, wash with it the chilblains. One application is all that is necessary.

AS EVERY particle of food must be acted upon by the gastric juice, or some of it will be troublesome afterward, it stands to reason that the finer food is cut, chewed, masticated, the more easily and perfectly will it dissolve or be digested. Meats, vegetables, any food masticated as fine as small shot, will certainly be digested far more easily and very much sooner than if it goes down in lumps as large as buckshot, or chestnuts or walnuts. Masticate the food fine in the mouth, and mix it well there with saliva.

APPLES AS FOOD.—A raw, mellow apple is digested in an hour and a half, while boiled cabbage requires five hours. The most healthy dessert that can be placed on the table is a baked apple. If eaten frequently at breakfast with coarse bread and butter, without meat or flesh of any kind, it has an admirable effect upon the general system, often removing constipation, correcting acidities and cooling off febrile conditions more effectually than the most approved medicines. If families could be induced to substitute them for pies, cakes and sweetmeats, with which their children are frequently stuffed, there would be a diminution in the total sum of doctors' bills in a single year sufficient to lay in a stock of this delicious fruit for the whole season's use.

TO ALWAYS have a good appetite—Never eat when not hungry; never eat rich food; never eat much; never eat heartily of rich or very nourishing food at tea time—nothing after. Better still, omit that meal when there is no special desire for food, fasting while sick till the appetite returns. To have an appetite at dinner—Do not fully satisfy the appetite in the morning. To have an appetite in the morning, take a light supper or none—nothing later. To avoid vomiting or a furred tongue, eat sparingly of wholesome, plain food. Plain, simple food is not only easy of digestion but actually contains more nourishment than the complicated dishes, the rich and concentrated foods such as pastry and highly seasoned dishes.

ONIONS IN CONSUMPTION.—Dr. Pierce, a physician of the Plymouth public dispensary, recommends the following: I have, in a former paper, mentioned the frequent desire of phthisical patients for onions and salt and smoked fish. Of those who asked, forty had a great desire for onions, eight had not so much desire; twenty-six desired pickles and vinegar, while four did not. I cannot avoid again remarking on the frequency with which onions are debarred young and delicate people and phthisical patients. It is a continually recurring experience with me to hear young people say how great is their desire for onions, which are often preferred raw, eaten with a little salt, and it is rare that I have ever heard of an onion disagreeing with them. The marked passion for special food, such as that which phthisical patients have for onions, puts us on the right path for future knowledge.

Austrian Dogs.

In Austria, while the large dogs are made to work, and make themselves useful in various ways, the little fellows are taken to the bosoms of the ladies, and treated as if they were veritable angels. It is not uncommon, when traveling, to see almost every lady with a dog in her arms, and occasionally a footman or maid, whose sole duty in traveling with the mistress is to take care of the dog, and see that he has water and food on the route.

The doctors tell many amusing anecdotes of having been called up at midnight and finding that their services were needed for a poodle that had been overfed in the effort to kill them with kindness. They could make heavier charges with the assurance of prompt payment, in such cases, than if the patient had been a child or a husband. "Love me, love my dog," seems to be the sentiment of these ladies; and on one occasion the writer saw a finely-dressed lady, who had her dog in her arms, take off her gloves while standing in a railway station, and diligently pursue and kill a flea which she had discovered depredating among the fleece of her favorite. It is quite common to see them led tenderly along with ribbons, and in some cases to see a gold chain attached to a lady's belt, and at the other end of the chain a poodle dog traveling by her side or reposing in her arms.

Signs in the shop windows tell you that "Dog soap is sold here," and that various patent compounds that will induce canine health and longevity are on sale. A lady walking in any of the public grounds with a dog is sure to be accosted by a number of seedy-looking individuals, who will draw out of their pockets pups, which they offer for sale. The offering for sale of anything in the public grounds being prohibited, they thus keep them concealed in their pockets. In the upper grades of life a mother trusts her children to servants and governesses, but her poodle dog she keeps under her own eye; and a scream from the nursery might pass unheeded, but a yelp from the drawing-room or the boudoir would startle "her Ladyship" from the soundest sleep. Of course there are exceptional cases, but it includes most of those who aspire to fashionable life. We see dogs caressed much more than children are, and their comfort studied with jealous care.

Gould as a Speech-Writer.

Gould's first start in the tannery business up in Delaware county was with a man of considerable note in the neighborhood—Col. Pratt. The Colonel had been in Congress, and was in the habit of making speeches in the district. He had a great opinion of himself, and was known all through the backwoods of this section, which, by the way, was all backwoods then. But, though he had been in Congress and could come out pretty strong on the stump, he was not "a —— literary fellar," by any means. On one occasion he was notified some time ahead that he would have a chance to speak at a ratification meeting. "All right," said Pratt, "I'll give 'em something good this time." Calling Gould, then only a stripling, into his office, he asked him if he thought he could get up a political speech. Gould reflected a minute and said he believed he could. "Then go ahead," said Pratt, "and I'll make it all right." He then gave Gould the main points that he wanted to cover. Gould went on with his work at the tannery, and sat up late at night over the speech. At the end of a week he brought the speech to Pratt, and read it to him in his office. The Congressman and boss tanner of the district fairly danced about his office as Gould went on with his speech, so well pleased was he, and when the reading was done he made out a check for $100 and handed it to the future millionaire and master of railroad manipulations.—Cor. Hartford Times.

The Mosquito in England.

Here it must be observed that mosquitoes are especially hard on two sorts of people. Young ladies and children, and many men, they sting, till the victims are all covered with blisters and in danger of erysipelas. This is pretty bad, but we think the nervous persons, whom mosquitoes sting little, but keep awake with their buzzing, are even more to be pitied. They find the mosquito's bark worse than his bite. The latter may not mark or hurt them much; it is a question of constitution; and there are people with whom the bite does not "take," as they say of vaccination. But they suffer all night long from the shrill, persistent noise of the mosquito's trumpet. At the first warning they leap up, light a candle, take it into bed, and try to catch the intruder. No one can guess how difficult this is. You soon find the mosquito on the curtain, where he lies apparently asleep. Very cautiously you stalk him, your hand is just over him, and justice is about to be done, when the vicious creature flies away and amuses himself in mid-air. Presently he settles, and the chase begins again, till the hunter sets fire to the flimsy curtains, and has quite enough work to do in extinguishing the fire. After that mosquitoes come and go as they please, without let or hindrance, and day dawns on a feverish and frantic man, who has only bagged two or three of his innumerable enemies. Late in the morning mosquitoes sleep, overcome with triumph and the refreshment which they have snatched from their enemy. They may now be killed, and it is curious to see—as any one who crushes them will see—how much of man's vital fluid one mosquito can absorb. They who are fortunately inexperienced in the ways of mosquitoes will now understand that the insect is one of the greatest players that nature tolerates. There are more dangerous flies—though the mosquito's bite is sometimes poisonous and severe—but there is no more irritating creature in the world than the mosquito.

Norway and Sweden suffer more even than the South from mosquitoes. The mild Bulgarian dreads them, and there is a ghastly story of a drunken Bulgarian who tied up his wife in a mosquito trap. The poor woman was bitten to death, and her husband observed in the morning that he had suffered almost as much as if he had not thought of his savage expedient. Greece is, perhaps, more remarkable for the insect "whence is derived the verb 'to flee'" than for mosquitoes; and the same remark holds good of the Baden contingent. None of the countless snakes of America or India cause more trouble, when the host of minor miseries is added up, than mosquitoes do.—London News.

Men Who Make Journalists.

It has been remarked that very few men who get into journalism start out with such intention. They drift in accidentally, are prompted as they develop capacity. Money, wealthy parents and influence are of no sort of service in getting a young man a place on a newspaper. There is no business that is so entirely independent of all these considerations as this. A wealthy father can easily get his son a location to read law or medicine, or push him forward in almost any rank in life he may select; but he is utterly powerless to do anything for him in a journalistic way. To be sure he may buy a newspaper, and set him up in that way, but unless there is something in him called "journalistic knack," a natural knowledge of what to write and how to write it, he will be a failure in that line, and all the money and influence of wealthy and perhaps powerful relatives will count for nothing. Some fond parents educate their sons with the special view of making journalists of them; but it is rare that we hear of these young men after a few years. Meanwhile, some youth born among the hills, having nothing more than a common school education, and the knowledge scraped up in a country printing office, will advance to the front rank in the profession. He has the journalistic knack, and forces recognition because he has it. He gets into a good position, not because he has wealthy parents to influence the proprietors of leading newspapers, but because he knows what to write and how to write it. His articles go in because they supply a demand, while perhaps the elaborate essays of a man educated on two continents are cast into the waste basket.

Ships Without Sailors.

It does not seem to have occurred to those who are so anxious to revive American commerce by subsidies that, even if they were to succeed in launching a fleet of American steamers, there would be no American sailors to man them. Naval officers might to some extent be induced to leave the navy and to take command of merchant vessels, but it would be impossible to find American sailors enough to make up a crew fit for a first-class ocean steamship. Our American vessels would have to be manned by foreigners, and it is difficult to see how the patriotism which can not tolerate the admission of a foreign-built ship to an American register could tolerate the presence of a crew of motley foreigners on the deck of an American-built ship.—N. Y. Times.

But "sailors" are not required in great numbers on steamships. The sails are not important to steamers. If it were not for the danger of breaking the screw, a steamer would be better and swifter without masts or sails, and they play a conspicuous but very subordinate role. Steamers are manned for the greater part as hotels are. A few real sailors are wanted, but they can be found in the fishing boats. Let us have the steamers, and there will be sailors enough.—Cincinnati Commercial.

Lincoln in Congress.

In December, 1847, Abraham Lincoln took his seat in Congress as a Representative from the State of Illinois. It was not long before he became a great favorite with the members and officers of the House, for his genial manners, pleasant voice and ready wit gave him a magnetic influence on all who came within his social sphere. He possessed but few personal attractions, his figure being tall and ungainly; but these deficiencies were amply compensated for by his many shining qualities of mind and heart. He was a fluent and ready speaker, and his speeches were remarkable for their directness and precision, although lacking in rhetorical grace and finish. He possessed a rich and inexhaustible fund of wit and humor, to which he gave expression in anecdotes and quaint observations, which it was pleasant to listen to. Whenever he obtained the floor to speak, the House gave him its undivided attention, and never failed to greet his sallies of wit and quick repartees with laughter and applause. One of the most remarkable of his speeches during his first and only term in Congress was delivered in July, 1848, in reply to one made a few days before by Mr. Iverson, of Georgia. The subject of Mr. Lincoln's speech was "Military Coat-Tails." In the speech of Mr. Iverson, that gentleman accused the Whig party of having deserted all their principles and taken shelter under the military coat-tail of Gen. Zachary Taylor, the candidate of the party for the Presidency. In the course of his remarks Mr. Lincoln proceeded to show that the Democratic party were amenable to a similar charge, having for twenty-five years relied upon the military reputation of Gen. Jackson for success, he having been made President out of it for eight years, while enough of it remained to make Presidents of several comparatively small men who succeeded him, and still relying upon it for the success of Gen. Cass, the nominee of the party at that time, their campaign papers everywhere declaring that Cass and Butler were of the "true hickory stripe." Toward the close of his speech Mr. Lincoln poured a torrent of ridicule upon the military reputation of Gen. Cass, and then alluded to his own exploits in the Black Hawk war; "where," he continued, "I fought, bled, and came away. If Gen. Cass saw any live fighting Indians at the battle of the Thames, where he served as Aide-de-Camp to Gen. Harrison, it was more than I did; but I had a good many bloody struggles with mosquitoes, and, although I never fainted from the loss of blood, I can truly say I was often very hungry. Mr. Speaker," added Mr. Lincoln, "if I should ever conclude to doff whatever our Democratic friends may suppose there is of black-cockade Federalism about me, and thereupon they shall take me up as their candidate for the Presidency, I protest they shall not make fun of us as they have of Gen. Cass by attempting to write me into a military hero."

The notes of Mr. Lincoln's speech on this occasion were written on sheets of foolscap paper, and lay on the desk before him. It was not many minutes after he had begun to speak before he abandoned his manuscript, and walked slowly down the narrow aisle leading to the area in front of the Clerk's desk and Speaker's chair. He carried his left arm behind him, and with it slightly lifted the skirts of a black swallow-tail coat, worn nearly threadbare, which hung loosely from his shoulders, while his right arm was extended, and his long, bony forefinger pointed toward his auditors on the opposite side of the hall. As he walked he spoke with great earnestness, until he had crossed the area and stood face to face with the Democratic Representatives, when he would quickly turn, and, hurrying back to his desk, look at his desk, look at his manuscript for a moment, and then resume his walk. When the Speaker's hammer fell he returned to his seat amid peals of laughter and applause, which continued for several minutes before order was restored and the regular business of the House resumed.

Mr. Lincoln's seat in the old Hall of Representatives was on the outer row, and near the western entrance. The marble statue erected to his memory stands within six feet of the spot formerly occupied by his chair and desk.—Washington Star.

DID HIM GOOD.

[From the New York Union.]

Mr. Charles H. Bauer, editor of the above paper and Notary Public, in a late issue mentions the following: Patrick Kenny, Esq., some time ago, suffered much from rheumatism and tried almost every means to rid himself of this painful evil, but in vain. He was advised to use St. Jacobs Oil, which he did so successfully that all pain has left him and he is as healthy and strong as ever before. Mr. Kenny is an enthusiastic advocate of St. Jacobs Oil, and it has done him good.

How it Feels to Drown.

It is not often that you hear of an editor with a curiosity. Most of them accept earthquakes, tornadoes, murders, fires and floods as every day occurrences, and even a nitroglycerine explosion next door would not interrupt the routine work of the sanctum very long. But a French editor, and the editor of a Lyons paper at that, had a curiosity to know how a person feels when drowning. He therefore put up a job on himself. He arranged to come within a hair's breath of drowning, but was to be pulled out in the nick of time, rolled on a barrel, hauled over the sands, thumped on the stomach and otherwise resuscitated. All went well during the first act. He leaped into the water, refused to struggle and gradually sank from sight. At the proper moment he was hauled up by a rope and act second commenced. This was an occasion where an editor was too smart. They rolled him according to programme, and seven or eight men tired themselves out with rubbing him and hanging up head downwards, but he was a dead man. He may know how it feels to drown, but he'll never trouble the public with a description of his feelings.

Let the Baby Sleep.

Nurslings should, therefore, be permitted to sleep to their full satisfaction; weakly babies, especially, need sleep more than food, and it is the safest plan never to disturb a child's slumber while the regularity of its breathing indicates the healthfulness of its repose; there is little danger of his "oversleeping" himself in a moderately warmed, well-ventilated room. Never mind about meal time; hunger will waken him at the right moment or teach him to make up for lost time.

[From the Sheboygan Falls (Sheboygan Co.) News.]

We never saw any one joyous when suffering from pain—neuralgia for instance. In relation to this malady Mr. George Guyett, Prop. Guyett House, thus informed our representative: I have used St. Jacobs Oil for neuralgia, and can confidently recommend it to any one similarly affected.

A Suggestion to Commissioner Loring.

A Nebraska man, writing to a New York paper, says he has made chinch bugs a life study, and all his obsevations go to show that the bugs are becoming more and more numerous and destructive every year, though their operations are confined strictly to spring and not to winter wheat. He predicts that in a few years, if no remedy is discovered for them, almost the whole Northwest will be obliged to give up raising spring wheat and depend on the winter varieties, which is a more risky and precarious crop. We trust that the present agricultural commissioner, Mr. Loring, will find some device by which the chinch bugs may be as happily abated as were the potato bugs by commissioner Le Duc. When the country was overrun with potato bugs and their destructiveness was increasing year by year, when they had reduced prosperous farms to poverty and the railroad tracks out West were covered with them a foot deep so that travel was impeded, Mr. Le Duc announced that the thing had gone far enough and he would now give the matter his attention. Calling to his aid an eminent chemist, the two devoted several days to making secret experiments with the bugs to see if they could not be turned to some account as an article of commerce. The result of their experiments was never given out to the public; but it was soon afterwards noticed that there was a great improvement in the quality of western whisky, and the potato bugs gradually disappeared. We have always believed that Commissioner Loring was a man of fully as much ability as Le Duc, and we look for a speedy and satisfactory remedy for the danger that has arisen from chinch bugs.—Peck's Sun.

Traveling Men

Editorial Courtesy.

A Wausau paper recently referred to a rival editor as a "whisky-swilling dead beat, whose breath was a pestilence," etc., but this was probably a figure of speech, and not intended to be construed literally—a sort of poetic license. Other remarks of a similar nature have occasionally been dropped, in a moment of absent-mindedness on the part of the editor, but on the whole we are proud of the country press, and a comparison of it with the great metropolitan dailies is greatly to its credit. We hope to see the Wisconsin press become a model for other editors to pattern after—remembering always that harsh words can never be recalled, but that kind words never die. If an editor cannot say a good thing of a man, there is no law compelling him to say anything. But if the individual is altogether bad, and his objects and aims are against the best interests of the community—if, in short, he averages more deviltry than decency to the acre—then open on him with grape and cannister at short range, and never let up as long as there is anything left that is an inch high. Churn him, walk on him with spikes in your boots, and lift him up tenderly with nitroglycerine bombs. Make him think you are displeased about something. Should he come into the office and offer to whale something out of you, as a slight testimonial, you will have to be guided entirely by circumstances in the matter—it is a point upon which we can give no advice. Under some circumstances an editor would be entirely justified in knocking the man down and throwing him out of the window, while others might find it of value to apologize. It is merely a matter of taste.—Milwaukee Sun.

Now Then, Marry a Coachman.

Newspaper readers will readily recall the sensation created two years ago by the elopement and marriage of a daughter of ex-Governor Hubbard, of Connecticut, with a coachman named Shepard. It has, since that time, been reported that the couple were living in pinching poverty, but this statement is not true. Soon after the marriage they went to board with Shepard's brother in Hartford. Mrs. Shepard occasionally visited her father's house to see her mother and sisters, but the presence of her husband in the home of her father was strictly forbidden. Shepard has a wealthy uncle living in Middletown, Conn., who became interested in Shepard after the elopement. The uncle was somewhat nettled by insinuations that Shepard was not good enough for the young lady, and to show that his sympathy was practical, made a tender of pecuniary assistance. He made deposit of the necessary amount of money, and Shepard was enabled to purchase an interest in a well-established livery business in New Haven. Not only is the former coachman doing well in business, but he is conducting himself in a manly manner in other ways, and his wife is reported to be very happy. She is seen frequently driving in her phaeton, and it is understood is kindly received by many of her old friends in New Haven. Once in a while she goes to Hartford, and is noticed as being in perfect health, and looking prettier than ever. She keeps up a thoroughly stylish appearance, and has money enough from her husband to warrant it, all of which proves that she is not "living in poverty," as thousands of people all over the country, who have become interested in her welfare, will be happy to learn.

A Paris journal says that Baron, the singer, is of an unusual height—so tall, indeed, that when he went the other day to consult a doctor about a severe cold in the head, the physician said, "My friend, you must have got your feet wet last year."

Weak women young or old, married or single, will be greatly benefited by Kidney-Wort.

FACTS FOR THE CURIOUS.

Prof. Scott says that a wood-pecker never runs down a tree-trunk.

In the growth of all animals, they pass from the simple to the complex. The young of the higher animals represent the full growth of the higher animals.

It is said on the best authority that a toad frequented the steps before the hall-door of a gentleman's house in Devonshire for upward of thirty-six years.

The minute lines and furrows on persons' hands are likely to receive a far more useful attention than the observation of the great lines by fortune-tellers. There is reason to believe that the spiral whorls on the thumb and finger-points are peculiar to individuals and races, and may be as certainly used to define the ethnological class or positive identification of the being possessing them as the measurements of the skull or the examination of a photograph would be.

According to Humboldt, the oldest town in the world is Yakutsk—5,000 inhabitants—in Eastern Siberia. It is not only the oldest, but probably the coldest. The ground remains frozen to the depth of 300 feet, except in midsummer, when it thaws three feet at the surface. The mean temperature for the year is 12.7 deg. Farenheit. For ten days in August the thermometer goes as high as 85 deg. From November to February the temperature remains between 40 deg. to 68 deg. below zero. The river Lena remains frozen for nine months in the year.

Friday, which has long been superstitiously regarded as a day of ill omen, has been an eventful one in American history. On Friday, Christopher Columbus sailed on his great voyage of discovery. On Friday, he, though unknown to himself, discovered the continent of America. On Friday, Henry III., of England, gave to John Cabot his commission, which led to the discovery of North America. On Friday, the Mayflower, with the Pilgrims, made the harbor of Princetown, and on the same day they signed that august compact, the forerunner of the present constitution. On Friday, George Washington was born. On Friday, Bunker Hill was seized and fortified. On Friday, the surrender of Saratoga was made; and on Friday, the surrender of Cornwallis at Yorktown occurred, the crowning glory of American arms. On Friday, Congress declared the colonies free and independent. Americans surely need not be afraid of Friday.

It is only when we regard our globe as a member of the planetary system, and that system in turn as a unit among the systems, that we realize how infinitesimal are its concerns and how relatively insignificant it is. We may, for practical purposes, treat the orbit of Neptune as the circumference of our planetary system, and state the diameter of it, therefore, as about 5,486,000,000 miles. But if we could suppose all this vast plane converted into a solid disk, instead of being as now for the most part empty space, and if to it were then given, by some means or other, a slightly luminous surface, it would appear to an observer upon the very nearest fixed star no more pretentious than a new shilling glittering in the sunshine would appear to an observer at a distance of over 100 yards. In other words, it would want fairly good eyes to discern it at all. We may safely say, then, that the annual thermal loss of our own little sphere, though sufficient to melt 777 cubic miles of ice, would, even though multiplied by centuries of centuries, no more affect the temperature of space than the striking of a match would avail to moderate the climate of Siberia.

Woman's Wisdom.

"She insists that it is more important that her family should be kept in full health than that she should have all the fashionable dresses and styles of the times. She therefore sees to it that each member of her family is supplied with enough Hop Bitters, at the first appearance of any symptoms of ill health, to prevent a fit of sickness with its attendant expense, care and anxiety." All women should exercise their wisdom in this way.—New Haven Palladium.

Table Etiquette.

If by writing this we can induce one man who now wipes his hand on the table cloth to come up and take a higher ground and wipe them on his pants, we shall feel amply repaid.

If you cannot accept an invitation to dinner do not write your regrets on the back of a pool check with a blue pencil. This is now regarded as ricochet.

A simple note to your host informing him that your washerwoman refuses to relent is sufficient.

On seating yourself at the table draw off your gloves and put them in your lap under your napkin. Do not put them in the gravy, as it would ruin the gloves and cast a gloom over the gravy. If you have just cleaned your gloves with benzine you might leave them out in the front yard.

Stones in cherries or other fruit should not be placed upon the tablecloth, but slid quietly and unostentatiously into the pocket of your neighbor or noiselessly tossed under the table.

Ladies should take but one glass of wine at dinner. Otherwise there might be difficulty in steering the male portion of the procession home.

Do not make remarks about the amount your companion has eaten. If the lady who is your company at table, whether she be your wife or the wife of some one else, should eat quite heartily, do not offer to pay your host for his loss or say to her: "Great Scott! I hope you will not kill yourself because you have the opportunity," but be polite and gentlemanly, even though the food supply be cut off for a week.

If one of the gentlemen drop a raw oyster into his bosom and he should have trouble in fishing it out, do not make facetious remarks about it, but assist him to find it, laughing heartily all the time.—Bill Nye.

Alligator Leather.

The rapid increase in the demand for alligator leather in Europe makes it possible that alligator farming may become an important industry in our Southern swamps. The foreign demand already amounts to many thousand hides a year. The tanning of alligator hides began about twenty years ago. At first Louisiana furnished the skins, and New Orleans was the center of the traffic. The general slaughter of alligators soon made them scarce in that State, and now Florida is the chief source of supply. The tanning is done at the North.

The Fashion in Gait for Girls.

The fashionable gait of the utter young girl at this season is an importation, like most of her articles of clothing. It is supposed to be an offspring of the utterly utter manners of the London æsthetic, who have set the fashion for languid, willowy, weary wabbles, now the rage at many fashionable gatherings among young women, who in a spirit of intense utterableness gaze into the depths of a new-blown lily or rose or silently study the heart of a field daisy. Upon the avenues, however, the great public see the æsthetic walk undimmed by the mellow light of a drawing room, and ameliorated by the rich colors of Persian portieres and Daghestan rugs. When the æsthetic appears upon the front doorstep with her Langtry hat she shakes out the bangles on her bracelets, pushes into better position the Jacqueminot roses at her belt or the field daisies in her fourth buttonhole, then shakes out the puffings of her polonaise, raises a balloon with its ivory handle carved like a calla lily, and prepares to get into shape for the fashionable gait. For the space of a minute her body seems to work upon eccentrics. Her spinal column shoots forward at an angle of about forty-eight degrees and remains rigid, her neck lifts, her chin goes about an inch and five-eights above its normal line, her nose naturally follows and perhaps improves upon the incline, her arms to the elbow points hug her sides like the wings of a duck, and the forearms hang like willow branches, while the hand that does not engage itself with the parasol hangs limp and languid. It requires two teeters to give the shape inertia, and off the æsthetic goes. Her progress defies accurate description. It has been compared to the amble of the kangaroo, but the naturalists insist that the kangaroo's movements have some element of grace. Others say it is very like a duck which flaps its wings, but the duck does not have French heels. A man of science says that there is nothing like it in the animal kingdom, although the sea gulls on the Pacific Islands have a similar motion in their walk.

"I can only take a medical view of it," said a physician. "I look upon it as much more dangerous than tight lacing."—Pittsburg Telegraph.

From the Hub.

There is perhaps no tonic offered to the people that possesses as much intrinsic value as the Hop Bitters. Just at this season of the year, when the stomach needs an appetizer, or the blood needs purifying, the cheapest and best remedy is Hop Bitters. An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure; don't wait until you are prostrated by a disease that may take months for you to recover in.—Boston Globe.

A reverend gentleman in Aberdeenshire having been summoned before the presbytery for tippling, one of his elders, the constant participator of his orgies, was summoned to appear as a witness against him. "Weel, John," said a member of the reverend court, did you ever see the accused the worse of drink?" "Weel, I wat no," answered John; "I've mony a time seen him the better o't, but never seen him the waur o't." "But did you ever see him drunk?" "That's what I'll never see," replied the elder; "for lang before he's half sickened I'm aye blind fou."

Endorsed and recommended by the medical profession, for Dyspepsia, General Debility, Female Diseases, Want of Vitality, Nervous Prostration, and Convalescence from Fevers, &c.

Gentlemen:—I was suffering from general debility to such an extent that my labor was exceedingly burdensome to me. A vacation of a month did not give me much relief, but on the contrary, was followed by increased prostration and sinking chills. At this time I began the use of your Iron Tonic, from which I realized almost immediate and wonderful results. The old energy returned and I found that my natural force was not permanently abated. I have used three bottles of the Tonic. Since using it I have done twice the labor that I ever did in the same time during my illness, and with double the ease. With the tranquil nerve and vigor of body, has come also a clearness of thought never before enjoyed. If the Tonic has not done the work, I know not what. I give it the credit.

THE editor of the Middlebury Record has the good sense to drop the much abused "we."

There is a movement on foot to start an extensive car factory at Elkhart. The Studebakers, of South Bend, it is claimed will become heavy stockholders in the concern.

MICHIGAN papers are pressing Judge Cooley or Judge Campbell for the place on the supreme bench made vacant by the death of Judge Clifford.

OUR exchanges are filled with complimentary notices of Gen. Slack. It is seldom we find a man who, in his life time was a thorough partisan, that has left so many warm friends in both parties.

THE campaign in North Carolina is over, and resulted in an overwhelming defeat for the prohibition party. The canvass was a very thorough one The prohibition question originated with the democrats in the legislature and was opposed by nearly all the colored republicans, but the result shows that many of both parties voted against it.

THE Republican, of last week, accuses us of having a "massive intellect." Now, we call that taking a mean advantage of a fellow, as we cannot defend ourself in either of the two methods usually resorted to by editors That is, we can neither deny the soft impeachment, nor charge it back on the editors of the Republican.

C. FOSTER, of Ohio, in his recent speech said that the government is now funding its debt at three per cent. in spite of democratic mismanagement in congress. Everybody but C. Foster remembers that the democrats in congress voted almost in a body for the three per cent. funding bill, and the republicans mostly voted against it. Then, when it had passed both houses, Hayes vetoed the bill to please the banks.

THE condition of the president has for the last few days caused a great deal of uneasiness. Last Saturday the fever rose somewhat, and on Sunday was still high. This was soon ascertained to be caused by the formation of another pus sack a little below the one that caused the trouble about two weeks ago. Monday forenoon he was put under the influence of ether, and another incision was made through to the track of the bullet, and below the one made at the other operation. The opening was made just below the twelfth rib. This facilitated the discharge of matter from the wound, and the patient was soon feeling much better. The doctors think he is still in a fair way to recover.

The lunatic of whom we spoke last week as having jumped from the cars in this city on Wednesday and taken possession of an upper room in the house of John Stouder, was captured on Thursday morning, brought to the city, and lodged in jail. He did quite an amount of damage in Mr. Stouder's house, tearing bedding and clothing, breaking apple-butter crocks and fruit jars etc. From tickets and papers in his possession, Marshal Barns learned that he came from Massachusetts, and was on his way to see his brother-in-law, Thomas Tenney, in Chicago. Mr. T. was telegraphed for, and came on Saturday morning. He took with him the unfortunate man, whose name is James O'Donnell, Marshal Barns accompanying them as far as LaPorte, as O'Donnell declared he would not go without him, his hallucination being that a couple of men followed him with a view of capturing him. O'Donnell came from Ireland last May, and Mr. Tenney said that he is an industrious and sober man.—[Goshen Times.

A boy hung on the cars at LaPorte, and was thrown under the train and killed.

Parties are now letting contracts on the new railroad from New Buffalo through LaPorte to Wanatah. At least so say our exchanges.

A barn containing a large amount of hay, wheat, agricultural implements and two horses was burned at Rolling Prairie early Monday morning. The property belonged to Mr. Luke Francis, of that place. One horse was rescued. A tramp who was refused work the previous night is suspicioned as the incendiary.—[Valparaiso Vidette.

An exchange says—Twenty years ago the body of Lavinia Harvey was buried in the cemetery at New Albany. After several years the body was exhumed for some purpose, and was found to be perfectly petrified. A few days ago it was found that the body had been taken out of its coffin, and it is believed to have been "resurrected" by some showman. An investigation is in progress.

Reliable Authority states that the contract for grading the C., W. & M. road in this vicinity, was let last Friday, but to what parties has not yet been made known. It is thought that the road will cross the St. Joseph between the starch mills and the bridge east, striking the north bank just east of Arisman's mill between the race and Christian creek. The authorized committee will be at that point to-day for the purpose of securing the right of way. The people of Elkhart may rejoice at the prospect of a speedy completion of the line north to the lake.—[Elkhart Democrat.

On Wednesday morning of last week Harvey Prough's boys heard their dog barking in the woods, went out to see what he had, and found him barking at a bear, Prough went out and tried to get the bear to tree, but bruin prefered to stay on the ground. Not having a gun of his own, he sent to a neighbor's and got an almost worthless thing that would not discharge until the bear had got so far off that he missed his mark. The news soon flew throughout the neighborhood, and men and boys came flocking in with dogs, guns, clubs, stones, butcher-knives and cheap revolvers, until there were some fifty in the chase. After running it around through cornfields and woods for some time, it passed through Wm. Wiler's field within six or eight rods of where they were binding oats and went into a dense thicket in the swamp, where they lost track of it. Prough says that it was one of the very largest of black bears, could run as fast as a horse, and he thinks that with a good gun he might have easily captured the old fellow.—[Lagrange Register.

AMONG THE MOUNDS.—The following interesting item is clipped from the Ft. Wayne Gazette of last Saturday: "This week they have been unearthing the bones of Indians in Noble county. On the farm of Jerry Noell, about three miles west of Rome City, are three mounds, located about 100 feet apart, forming, if connected by straight lines, a triangle. They are 30 to 40 feet in diameter and were originally five or six feet high, before the plow-share was driven over them, being situated in a cultivated field. On Wednesday a party headed by Mr. Goodspeed, a young gentleman who is something of an archaeologist, dug into one of the mounds and took out 17 skeletons. The next day they exhumed 11 more—making 28 in all. The remains, which were in rather a good state of preservation, were packed closely in a space about eight feet square. The bodies had evidently been buried in a sitting or standing posture. The bones are supposed to be mostly those of adult males, yet it is believed that two or three skeletons are those of women and children. The better opinion is, that the remains are not over one hundred years old. On one of the mounds is a white oak stump two feet in diameter. Digging into this brought to light a bed of ashes and charcoal—indicating a higher antiquity than the other. No bones found here. The third mound has not yet been explored."—Lagrange Register.

The Butler and Pleasant Lake clubs played a match game of base ball last Saturday, at the latter place. The Pleasant Lake boys won by a score of 14 to 6.

We forgot to mention last week that John Less has bought out the other partners of the Citizens' bank, and is now conducting it alone. H. K. Less is still cashier.

The Knights of Honor, of this place and Kendallville, took an excursion to Pleasant Lake yesterday. It might be in order to remark just here, that this order is one of the most flourishing institutions in the country.

Sunday witnessed the passing through of the second annual excursion of the Universalist churches of Fort Wayne and Muncie. Many of our people joined them. The exercises were of the usual character, such as sermons, music, boat-rides, picnic dinners and the like.

The excursion to Pleasant Lake last Saturday was patronized by quite a number of our citizens. They had a very pleasant day of it. But some of the too jubilant ones, especially the Delong boys, couldn't get through without a little fun, and managed to leave their scalps hanging to the belt of some Fort Wayne braves.

The Reform churches of Waterloo, Hudson, Mt. Zion and the Tamarack will have an excursion and picnic at Pleasant Lake on Saturday of this week. There will be sermons, singing and other religious exercises. A cordial invitation is extended to all, to join the excursion, and have a day's pleasant and profitable recreation.

That grove of maples on the grounds of the Jackson road near the depot, appears to be thriving. This will be a nice park in a few years, and many a weary one will lie in the cool shade, on the green grass, and remember gratefully the company whose good taste and foresight has done so much for the comfort of its patrons.

Another house top burned Monday evening. The house on the bank of the creek and east of the bridge in Uniontown, caught fire in the roof between six and seven o'clock p. m. The alarm was given, but the great distance to be traveled by the engine and hose gave the fire a good start, but as soon as the hose was brought to bear the fire was got under control, although it had already extended along under the roof and beyond the comb to the other side. The upper part of the building is of course badly damaged both by fire and water. Still the fact that it was saved at all under the circumstances is greatly to the credit of our efficient fire department.

Men of endurance have healthy kidneys and liver. No aches in the back, no piles or constipation. The cure for these diseases is Kidney-Wort. The Noted Train Robbers.

The publishers of "Border Outlaws" assert that their history of the Younger Brothers and Frank and Jesse James, published six months ago, has already reached the enormous sale of more than 60,000 copies. Since the late robbery and double murder at Winston, Mo., they have issued a new edition, containing a full history of that outrage, with illustrations, which brings the events in the lives of these airy gentlemen of the highway down to the present moment. For lively reading, we presume this book can hardly be surpassed. Persons desiring agencies will find advertisement elsewhere.

Holloway's Pills.

Never dispair—something that never fails—Fever and Ague—To the sick it is of little consequence how they are cured, whether from a rational view of the disease or by the rules defined for the guidance of the profession, so long as the cure is certain and expeditious. To a suffering man the question on the relative merits of quinine or calomel is uninteresting. The faculty may wrangle and discuss their various theories, but Dr. Holloway's treatment dispels doubt ere the disciples of Esculapius have finished the first stage. Ball to the Bat.

AUBURN AND WATERLOO NINES IN THE FIELD.

Last Friday afternoon the Waterloo ball nine came down here to play Os. Allen's nine a friendly game. Now, Os'. nine has been strutting around for some time, shaking hands with each other and telling how they were going to knock the immortal socks off the Waterloo plugs. The game was called promptly and the work began—a large umbrella with E. T. Bryaland at one end of it acting as umpire. There were several whitewashes on both sides, but Os'. nine received the majority of the goose eggs. The crowd in attendance was numerous; there being several representatives from Europe, Cincinnati, Chicago and other large places. Dispatches were furnished the Chicago Times every time the sides changed, at an enormous expense. The score ran like this:

Waterloo nine	27.
Os. Allen's nine	10.
Majority	17.

Barnum's Show.

THE FUNNY PART OF IT FOR THE AUBURN BOYS.

After the circus was over and the people from this town returned to the Saginaw depot waiting for the train to come home, some of the boys "boweled up," and became so funny that a policeman "stuck in his lip." Two officers of the law took Ab. Coop by one arm and Ab's. partner took him by the other and, with all the strength they had, pulled in different directions, nearly dividing the fellow into two separate pieces. While one of the policemen was reaching in his hip pocket for a revolver, Ab. and his pard broke loose and made away at a rapid pace, the officer following them, crying: "Git oudt off de vay, I going to shood." One or two shots were fired and the boys overhauled again. They started for the cooler with them, when Tommy Cool got too close to the police, and one of them said: "The first man who crowds up again will get this lantern over his head." Tommy says, "I guess I have a right to walk up town if I want to," when the police placed his hand on Tommy's shoulder and said, "and I will assist you up town." They all Sundayed over in Wayne, and we hope had a good time.

Toad Latson, the public square of DeKalb county, got terribly excited over the cry of fire, and the boys say he did his best to keep up with the steam engine until his bellows machinery entirely gave out.

Pat Murphy says it was a good show, but they didn't perform everything that was on the bill-boards.

Fatty Umber laughs as hard as ever he can, when he tells about that one car carrying over sixty boys who had been to see the elephant.

Every one speaks highly of the circus, and says that the crowd in the city was quite large.

—The "Old Horse Doctor," as he is familiarly called, has been operating on Hank Yesbera's steed. The horse handles himself apparently better than he did, and we hope he will come out all right, and that when the storms of next winter shall come, he will not be affected with rheumatism, but make the Bells jingle for Henry.

LET THE GOOD WORK GO BRAVELY ON.

To-morrow is the day set for awarding the contract for our new school-house, and we hope the contractor who gets the job will push the work speedily forward. The beautiful grounds, in the west part of town, look attractive. The grass and trees are growing beautifully, the old debris of the burnt structure is entirely cleared away, the old brick have all been cleaned and nicely piled up, and all that now remains to make things pleasant and enterprising-like is a new building.

—Ben. Williams purchased a new buggy and "old hoss" for the express comfort of himself and family. He hitched the horse in front of Hoff's grocery and went off a ways to see how the rig looked at a distance. In the meantime the horse wished to see what was behind him. He couldn't turn around in the shafts very well, and he tried to stand on his hind feet and look down his back, but this failed. Ben. and Helms succeeded in getting him loose from the buggy, and now the horse is attached to the sprinkling wagon and the buggy at the repair shop.

—The many friends of Miss Alice Silver will be glad to note her return home after an absence of four weeks. She has been in attendance at the musical normal at Fort Wayne. She received an average of ninety per cent upon examination. The principal, assisted by the school, gave a concert on the evening of the closing day consisting of vocal and instrumental exercises, Miss Alice taking part and executing many praises with her power and skill, receiving the compliments of the school and audience.

—T. J. Cuppy is driving business in his new location at Columbia City. A call at his place of business showed that he lost none of his old-time vim by his removal to that place. And we must not forget Tom's. better-half, who had just brought her smiling face home from a fishing excursion to Loon lake. She and Tom, can carry more fishing tackle, frying pans and guns than any other couple we know of. A short view of the ruins of the expedition satisfied us of this.

—While in Columbia City, the other day, we called on J. L. Ferguson, the marble cutter, and found him busy as usual. He is now working on an original design that he intends to exhibit as a specimen of his talent in sculpture, at some of the fairs this season. We learn that he has erected several fine monuments near Auburn and is now engaged on some others. We have known Mr. F. for a long time and can testify to his skill in marble work.

—It was circus day, and he told his wife he was just going to Ft. Wayne to "purchase a thresher." The wife followed him, and at the proper time, when she met him going to the show with a girl hanging to his manly arm she smashed an umberella over his head, lectured the girl, slapped her liege lord, and took the circus and lemonade all by herself.

—John Ward has packed up and started for Michigan, where he has purchased a farm and will hereafter till the soil. John got his stake from Uncle Sam, it being a back pension of some $1,500. Seems to us that farming would be pretty hard work for a disabled soldier.

—Men have been at work putting in a stone gutter along the west side of Main street, from Kiblinger's north to Sixth street. They have also raised the crossing below the COURIER office, so that a person can reach the pavement without the aid of a step-ladder.

—We, this week, call attention to Root & Co's. new advertisement. The business this firm does in the line of dry goods, carpets, &c., is not equaled by any firm doing business in Northern Indiana. Don't forget to call and see their stock of goods when you are in Fort Wayne.

—The catalogue of the Butler graded school is just received. It is neatly printed and contains a great deal of information of value to students, and others who take an interest in the public schools. Send for a catalogue to W. L. Blair, trustee, or to the principal, Mr. O. Z. Hubbell.

—The Baptist people will hold a basket meeting in Baker's grove northeast of town next sabbath. Services to begin at half past ten o'clock a. m. Rev. W. D. Trover, of Monroeville, Ind., will preach in the morning and some one of the visiting brethren in the evening. All are invited.

Fred. April's Dream.

SIM. TARNEY AND FRED. ON THE SAME ROAD.

Fred. April says that he had a very peculiar dream the other night, that goes something like this: He had been sick for some time and finally died. He was traveling slowly and wearily along the road which leads to that "Pleasant Land," when he came to a place where there was a fork in the road, and while deciding which way to go Sim. Tarney came along.

"Hello, Fred.," says Sim., "where are you bound for?"

"That's just what's bothering me," answered Fred.

After making a short journey they came to a huge stone gate, and Sim. told Fred. to try and open it. Finding that his effort was in vain, he rattled hard upon the latch and the gate slowly opened. A large, ugly looking object made its appearance and asked what was wanting. Fred said that they wished to enter.

"Who is that with you," demanded the gateman.

"That's Sim. Tarney," said Fred.

"What!" shouted the angry looking individual; "not Sim. Tarney, the butcher from Auburn?"

Fred. bowed his head.

The old fellow hesitated a few moments, and turning backward beckoned for his imps to come. They all surrounded him, when he said:

"Children, take off my cloven foot, unscrew my tail—Sim. Tarney will run this institution henceforth and forever.

Don't Blow.

PEOPLE WHO "KNOW TOO MUCH" AND TALK TOO MUCH.

We were amused the other evening listening to a few intelligent (?) remarks made by several "Smart Alecs" sitting upon the court-yard fence. The town marshal would be a subject of pity if these fellows had him to govern. They think it is his duty to superintend the work on the streets, collect taxes, see that no boisterous conduct takes place, travel over the streets until midnight each evening, be the first man at every knock-down, and, in fact, be a sort of omnipresent individual. Don't blow so much, fellow men. The marshal must have some rest; he can only be at one place at a time, and remarks of this nature only go to show that these individuals did not make themselves, or they would have used better material in the structure.

—John Brown was running his horse down Main street, Tuesday, in order to get him away from the flies—that's all—and the Marshal "collared" the whole rig with the exception of John, who jumped from the buggy and kept right on running until he crossed the corporation lines, when he sat down and took a blow.

—Michael Seiler, who was principal of the school in this place a few years ago, and more recently superintendent of the public schools at Lafayette, has recently been elected to a position in the State Normal school at Terre Haute. He takes the department of geography.

—The state camp-meeting of the M. E. church is now in session at Warsaw. It is held in the fair grounds, and those who have attended say that the most perfect order is maintained, and great interest manifested in the meetings. It lasts about a week longer.

—The tenders working for Picker, Bumpus & Spach quit labor one day last week for the reason that Spach did more bossing than they could stand. We believe, however, that the matter has been settled, and they resumed work again this week Monday.

—A bath in hot whisky twice a week is recommended as a sure cure for rheumatism.—[Wabash Plain Dealer.

If a fellow will "bathe" himself on the outside of Auburn whisky for a short time, we will guarantee a cure of any disease.

—Now muzzle your dogs—the dog days have come. We have heard some one say that a muzzle over a dog's mouth acts as suspenders to his "pants." Then at this time of the year a muzzle will be of service in two ways.

—Forepaugh has dismissed his $10,000 beauty and taken a Chicago girl to serve as a beauty model. Pooh, he could have got one in Auburn, without going way to Chicago.

—Wrap your water jug in a wet woolen blanket and the water will remain cool for a half day in the field The evaporation from the blanket produces cold in the jug. Keep the blanket wet.

—Col. Slaybaugh, proprietor of the down town grocery, has the nobbiest two-year-old colt, and nicest cheese case in town. When you hear anybody say that his neighbors can beat him, tell 'em to "cheese it."

—Doc. Cowan is getting his buggy fixed up and painted, and 'Squire says "de ole black mare am in boss shape; slick is a mole; yes, sah." Won't they glide smoothly along?

THE Commissioner of Agriculture proposes to investigate in earnest what can be done to reclaim and render marketable the arid regions of the West, and has formed a commission consisting of Prof. Hilyard (colord), ex-Gov. Famaso, of Nebraska, and T. C. Jones, of Ohio—three of the most eminent scientific agriculturists in the country—to visit the region.... MRS. GARFIELD received letters of sympathy and condolence from the Christian Churches of Southampton, Chester, Southport and Liverpool, England, together with a draft of £100 as a contribution to the building fund of the Church of the Disciples in Washington, which the President and his family attend. The draft was sent by the members of the Christian church in England as a token of thankfulness for the preservation of the President's life.... Mr. Loring, the Commissioner of Agriculture, has requested Prof. C. A. White, of Greeley, Col., and Prof. Samuel Aughey, of Lincoln, Neb., to act as a commission for the selection of a site for sinking experimental wells in the arid plains east of the Rocky mountains.

GUITEAU has placed in the hands of District Attorney Corkhill a petition asking that he be released on bail. It is not at all likely that Guiteau's prayer will be granted, and it is certain that if he were released he would not be quite safe. It is said that there have been formed in Washington, Baltimore and Philadelphia organizations which would deal with Guiteau after a fashion which that person would not like.

FOREIGN.

CLARE SEWELL READ, the well-known English agriculturist, spoke at an agricultural meeting in England, and warned the farmers that they need not expect a "great" grain crop. He said that although the crops looked well they would not bear close inspection. The Mark Lane Express, in its recent issues, expressed fears akin to those of Mr. Read.... The anti-Jewish agitations and consequent riots have again broken out in Russia. Recently thirty houses belonging to Jews in the villages of Borispol and Btrizan in the Government of Poltava were destroyed. The rioters fired on the Russian troops, killing four.... Afghanistan dispatches state that the battle between the Ameer and Ayoob Kahn lasted three hours, and that 300 or 400 men were killed on each side.... The Irish Land bill passed the House of Commons on the 29th ult., by a vote of 220 to 14. The minority was composed of extreme Tories. Most of the Tories and some of the Parnellites and Parnell himself abstained from voting. The measure then went to the House of Lords, and was read a first time.

AMONG the Irish members who refused to vote for the third reading of the Irish Land bill are Parnell, Biggar, Healey, Redmond, Arthur O'Connor, Leamy and T. P. O'Connor. It is reported that these gentlemen left the House amid "derisive cheering." It is quite probable that this little band of "extremists," as they are called, may be the nucleus of what may become a very formidable party in the House of Commons.... The Spanish Government has addressed a remonstrance to the French ministry with reference to the plundering of the Spanish Vice Consulate when the French troops entered Sfax. .... The Chief of Police of Rome has been dismissed for allowing the disgraceful street riot during the reinterment of the remains of the late Pope Pius IX.

PARNELL was "named" in the House of Commons for interrupting the debate on Indian affairs to allude to the Irish political prisoners. Mr. Gladstone then moved that the offender be suspended for the remainder of that sitting, which was carried by 132 to 14. Before it was decided, however, Parnell arose and left the House.... The London Standard says that the indications point to an average wheat crop in England, that the barley crop will certainly be an average one, the root crops will be poor and the potato crop excellent. The prospects of the Scotch farmer are not quite so bright as in England. The crop prospects in Ireland are excellent.... A Panama paper states that some Chilians fell into the hands of the Peruvian Gen. Montoneros, who horribly mutilated them, in revenge for the shooting of some brutal Peruvian outlaws.... In a terrible explosion in a mine at Lourches, France, ten persons were killed and twenty grievously wounded.... Prince Napoleon has written his partisans in France, advocating a national plebiscite for electing a chief of the nation.

SHEIK MAHMOUD, one of the leaders in the movement to excite a "holy war" against the French in Africa, has been arrested in Constantinople by order of the French Consul stationed there. He was immediately taken on board a French man-of-war, and will be sent to France to answer a charge of conspiracy against the public peace in Algeria. Documents were found in his possession showing the existence of a vast Moslem conspiracy against France.... In the case of McGrath and McKevitt, the dynamite fiends, the Liverpool jury found both prisoners guilty, and sentenced McGrath to penal servitude for life and McKevitt for fifteen years.... Ayoob Khan has occupied Candahar, from which he was driven at such expense of blood and treasure by the British, a short time ago.

BRADLAUGH, true to his threat, attempted to enter the British House of Commons by force. He was removed from the lobby by the police and escorted into the Palace yard, where he stood for some time with his arms folded, three officers barring his way to the House. When the House opened the Speaker declared the door closed, and Gladstone asserted that Bradlaugh has now no more right than a stranger. At this moment Bradlaugh endeavored to force an entrance to the House, but was dragged from the doors and handed over to a party of six policeman, his coat being torn in the struggle. He then went to Bow street for a summons against the police, which was refused, but the magistrate urged him to file information for assault.

How to Prevent Drowning.

A writer in Nature says: I wish to show how drowning might, under ordinary circumstances, be avoided even in the case of persons otherwise wholly ignorant of what is called the art of swimming. The numerous frightful casualties render every working suggestion of importance, and that which I here offer I venture to think is entirely available.

When one of the inferior animals takes the water, falls, or is thrown in, it instantly begins to walk as it does when out of the water. But when a man who can not "swim" falls into the water, he makes a few spasmodic struggles, throws up his arms, and drowns. The brute, on the other hand, treads water, remains on the surface, and is virtually insubmergible. In order, then, to escape drowning, it is only necessary to do as the brute does, and that is to tread or walk the water. The brute has no advantage in regard of his relative weight, in respect of the water, over man, and yet the man perishes while the brute lives. Nevertheless, any man, any woman, any child who can walk on the land may also walk on the water just as readily as the dog does, if only he will, and that without any prior instruction or drilling whatever. Throw a dog into the water and he treads or walks instantly, and there is no imaginable reason why a human being under like circumstances should not do as the dog does.

The brute, indeed, walks in the water instinctively, whereas the man has to be told. The ignorance of so simple a possibility—namely, the possibility of treading water—strikes me as one of the most singular things in the history of man, and speaks very little indeed for his intelligence. He is, in fact, as ignorant on the subject as the new-born babe. Perhaps something is to be ascribed to the vague meaning which is attached to the word "swim." When a man swims it means one thing; when a dog swims it means another and quite a different act. The dog is wholly incapable of swimming as a man swims, but nothing is more certain than that a man is capable of swimming, and on the instant, too, as a dog swims, without any previous training or instruction, and that by so doing, without fear or hesitancy, he will be just as safe in the water as the dog is.

The brute in the water continues to go on all fours, and the man who wishes to save his life and can not otherwise swim must do so too, striking alternately one, two, one, two, but without hurry or precipitation, with hand and foot, exactly as the brute does. Whether he be provided with paw or hoof, the brute swims with the greatest ease and buoyancy. The human being, if he will, can do so too, with the further immense advantage of having a paddle-formed hand, and of being able to rest himself when tired, by floating, a thing of which the animal has no conception.

Men and animals are able to sustain themselves for long distances in the water, and would do so much oftener were they not incapacitated, in regard to the former, at least, by sheer terror, as well as complete ignorance of their real powers.

QUARRELS would be short-lived if the wrong were only on one side.

ADDITIONAL NEWS.

DR. TANNER has located at Erie, Pa. He is preparing a proposition to the medical faculty of New York to fast for three months. He declares that, if the air in his room be strongly charged with electricity, he can obtain the negative element from the disintegration of his tissue, and fast for ninety-five days. .... THE conservative Democrats of Virginia gathered at Richmond in State Convention on the 4th inst. Thomas S. Bocock was made permanent President. GUITEAU'S petition to be admitted to bail, says a Washington dispatch, is in some respects one of the most remarkable documents that has ever been drawn up for the consideration of a court of justice. It is now in the possession of District Attorney Corkhill, in whom Guiteau has the most implicit confidence, and to whom he intrusts all his secrets, if a man who talks so freely and unreservedly can be said to have any secrets. Guiteau is undoubtedly becoming anxious to escape the penalty of his crime. It is apparent that he has had enough of imprisonment, and that he has made up his mind he will seek to escape the penalty of the law by a plea of insanity. His petition to be admitted to bail is drawn in legal form, although there is much in it that no lawyer would care to insert, while there is much also that a cunning man, who is determined to feign insanity, or a man really insane, would make a part of his application. Should a lawyer be appointed to conduct Guiteau's case, this application will unquestionably be used as evidence of insanity. Guiteau, in asking for release on bail, expresses great sorrow that the President has suffered so much and so long from the wound he inflicted. He asks his release because he fears that confinement will make him insane. He repels with scorn the idea that he is now insane, or that he was insane when he conceived or committed the crime. He insists strongly that he is now sane, but he says that he feels "the nimbus of insanity playing around his brain." He then goes on to recite some facts that indicate that there is insanity in his father's family. He announces that he proposes to make his own defense, with competent legal assistance. Guiteau wants his temporary release, not only that he may escape impending insanity, but that he may take a trip to Europe, where he wishes to remain a month or two.

The total internal-revenue collections, from all sources, for the past fiscal year aggregated $135,229,902.

A SYNDICATE of American, French and German bankers has resolved to construct a canal from Baltimore to the Atlantic, across the peninsula of Maryland and Delaware, at an estimated cost of $8,000,000. The cut will be 120 feet wide, 26 feet deep, and require eighteen months to complete. Baltimore commerce will thus gain 225 miles of sailing.... The French Government having invited the United States Government to send some officers to witness the autumn maneuvers of the French army, Secretary of War Lincoln has designated Maj. Gen. John M. Schofield, Col. Robert S. Lamotte and Capt. James Chester to act on the occasion.

PATRICK T. HICKIE, a young Irishman of London, has been convicted of threatening to kill Secretary Forster unless he released the Irish prisoners and resigned his office. The verdict was accompanied by a recommendation to mercy, and the counsel for the crown announced that Mr. Forster desired that the sentence be the lightest consistent with justice.... The treaty between the English and the Boers has been signed and ratified, and the Government of the Transvaal turned over to the Boers. The native chiefs are very much dissatisfied, and threaten to rebel against Boer rule at whatever cost.... The American ship Calcutta has been lost on the coast of Africa. Only three men were saved.

May Chilton.

There is a beautiful tradition that the first foot which passed the snow-clad rock of Plymouth was that of May Chilton, a fair young maiden; and that the last survivor of those heroic pioneers was May Allerton, who lived to see the planting of twelve out of the thirteen colonies which formed the nucleus of the United States. In the Mayflower eighteen wives accompanied their husbands to a waste land, and uninhabited save by the wily and vengeful savage.

On the unfloored hut, she, who had been nurtured amid the rich carpets and draperies of the mother land, rocked her new-born babe, and complained not.

She, who in the home of her youth had arranged the gorgeous shades of embroidery, compounded the rich venison partly as her share of the housekeeping, now pounded the coarse Indian corn for her children's bread, and bade them ask God's blessing ere they took their scanty portions. When the snows sifted through their miserable roofs upon the little ones, she gathered them closer to her bosom; she taught them the evening prayer and holy hymn, though the war-whoop of the Indian rang through the wild. Amid the untold hardships of colonial life she infused new strength into her husband by her firmness, and solaced his weary hours by her love.—Mrs. Lydia Sigourney.

Cure for a Rattlesnake Bite.

"While out hunting a short time since," said he, "I was bitten by a rattlesnake on the back of my left hand, and, having heard that if powder was burned on the bitten part it would be an antidote to the poison, I immediately poured a small quantity of powder on the bitten place, struck a match and set fire to it; the result was that I felt no inconvenience and experienced no pain or trouble whatever from the bite." The experiment is certainly worth trying, only be careful and don't blow yourself up.—"Tale o a Sportsman."

THE PRESIDENT.

WASHINGTON, July 30.

Yesterday was substantially a repetition of the day before in the President's case, except that the fever came on later in the evening, and was not so marked. The temperature through the day was normal, and the pulse ranged from 92 to 98. The patient said that he felt decidedly better, and expressed a desire for more solid food. He also said that he felt stronger, and asked to be propped up in bed for a while. This request was granted by the surgeons, and for half an hour or so the President, supported by pillows, sat up nearly erect in bed. This change of position gave him considerable relief, and, upon lying down again, he fell asleep. All his surgeons speak most hopefully of him. None of them really fear an abscess, though they are prepared for it should one form. Dr. Bliss said that the wound is healing slowly, but fast enough, and the surgeons do not now fear an abscess. The fever declines so quickly every evening that the doctors now attribute much of the rise in temperature to the dressing of the wound. That is necessarily painful, and the President seems to dread it more in the evening.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 1.

The President is progressing very favorably, his condition during the past two days being unmarked by even the slightest bad feature. So much confidence is felt in his continued progress to health that Secretary Blaine has informed Minister Lowell, at London, that he will discontinue sending any more official dispatches. Dr. Bliss believes that, with the same progress toward convalescence continued for a short time longer, there is no reason why the President should be unable to leave his sick-room in three weeks.

The location of the bullet has been determined with such exactness as to confirm the original opinion of Dr. Bliss, which was that it had found lodgment in the front wall of the abdomen. Bell's indicator, the new machine invented to detect the whereabouts of bullets buried out of sight, was given a trial yesterday, and, although the machine was not in perfect working order, it indicated the presence of the ball in the front wall of the abdomen about five inches below and to the right of the naval, and just over the groin. It is considered by no means certain that the removal of the ball will be necessary, as it is giving no trouble at present. Another and more thorough trial with the indicator is to be had, and even when the precise location of the ball shall have been determined thereby it is probable that no new incision will be made to secure its removal. In any event the surgeons will be in no hurry to subject the sufferer to this new ordeal, if, indeed, it is to be suffered at all.

Steward Crump and another attache of the White House have been completely prostrated by the malaria of the Potomac.

WASHINGTON, Aug 2.

The President continues to get better. His appetite increases daily, and his physicians now say there is no reasonable doubt of his recovery. His bill-of-fare now embraces coffee and kumyss, beside the more solid fare hitherto partaken of. The wound discharged freely at the dressing last evening, and the appearance of the pus was in every way satisfactory. The afternoon fever was light and subsided quickly, and the patient went to sleep earlier than usual, and slept well.

Prof. Bell, the famous telephone inventor, for the second time applied his patent induction machine to the vicinity of the wound, and exactly located the bullet, the position of which coincides with that surmised by the surgeons. It is believed to be about two and one-half inches inside the body, and is known to be four and one-half inches below and to the right of the naval, just above the groin. The surgeons do not intend to attempt the extraction of the ball at present. It is believed that the President can be removed from the White House by Aug. 15.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 3.

President Garfield is gaining in strength very rapidly, and it is now thought quite probable that he will be able to leave his sick couch in a fortnight, or three weeks at most. The evening fever continues, and will probably continue for some time to come. It quickly subsides, however, and the physicians apprehend no danger. A change has been made within the last few days by which the patient's head and shoulders are raised, which affords him much relief. All the attending physicians say that there is no feature of the case that does not indicate rapid and complete recovery.

WASHINGTON, Aug 4.

The progress of the President toward convalescence is proceeding in a most satisfactory manner. His physicians say he is better than at any time since the shooting. The "granulation" of the wound (the process of forming new tissue), increased strength, comfortable and normal sleep at night, an increased proportion of solid food, and an almost entire absence of the febrile condition during the afternoon are the welcome signs of a return to health and vigor.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 5.

Each succeeding day finds the President's condition much better, and his strength increased. Yesterday he rested comfortably, and partook of more solid food than on any day since the shooting. The evening fever was quite light, and receded almost immediately. The physicians have discontinued the daily hypodermic injections of morphia. Dr. Hamilton said to an Associated Press reporter yesterday, in reply to a direct question: "You may quote me as saying the President will certainly get well. I consider him out of danger." He also stated it as his opinion that there was no malaria in the President's system. He said that the patient was not yet in a fit condition for removal, but when he is a trip down the Potomac would have a beneficial effect and hasten his recovery.

Sayings of Little Ones.

Little Artie came running in from the field one day, exclaiming: "Ma! ma! I seed suffin' down here that sticked his hudd [head] right down in his monf." Investigation proved that he had found a mud-turtle.

When little Minnie was 2 years old she asked for some water one night. When it was brought she said: "Papa, can't you get me some fresh water? This tastes a little withered." Her little sister Belle had been accustomed to a light in the room, and waked in great distress, crying: "Me can't see, Aunt Bessie; my eyes are all blowed out." One day, when Minnie was 4 years old, she was telling her grandmother about the sons of Noah—Shem, Ham and Japheth. Her grandmother said: "What, Minnie, ham like this on the table?" "Oh, no, grandmother!" she replied, "like Abra*ham*."

Little Nell mashed her finger in the door, and came up crying and holding it in her other hand. All at once she stopped, as if listening; then, looking up through her tears, exclaimed: "Mamma, there's a little heart in my finger; I feel it frobbing."—Youth's Companion.

NEW inventions always bring new dangers. The janitor of the German reichrath, getting too near the battery lighting the legislative chambers, was permanently paralyzed in the right half of his body. An iron-wheel buggy passing over the electric railroad, produced an explosion, injuring the proverbial young man and woman riding in it.

THE best part of man's life is in the world of his natural affections, and that realm has laws of its own that neither know nor heed king nor congresses, and are deaf even to the voices of shouting popular majorities, but heed and obey rather the gentle voice of woman and the cry of helpless and feeble childhood.—Senator Bayard.

WHY are you barbarously imprisoned by your fears? Why do you carry burdens all the day on account of the fears of an unexplored next day, next week, next month? Why do you fish on the troubled stream of fear and bring to land fish that have no money in their mouth? Why do you not say, "Let my life flow tranquil and pure in that higher realm of faith and trust and let the future take care of itself?"

A Feminine Trick.

A feminine trick, very common among foreigners at Rome, Italy, is described as follows: A lady goes to a milliner's and looks over her stock of bonnets. She selects those which she thinks will suit her, and begs the milliner to send them to her the following morning that she may try them on at home and select the one which suits her. The poor milliner consents. At 9 o'clock she sends the bonnets. The lady is not up. Will the "young woman" call again a little later? The "young woman" consents to leave the bonnets until 3 o'clock. What does my lady do then? She takes the bonnet she likes best to a little working milliner in a back shop of a back street, and bids her make one exactly like the model she leaves with her until half past 2 o'clock, when she takes it back to the grand milliner, saying that she is very sorry, but none of them "suit her."

THE Washington telegraph office sent 270,371 words for the newspapers, and 10,223 private dispatches on the day of the President's assassination.

A PHILADELPHIA man, being slapped in the face by his wife, turned white with rage, stood still for a moment as though irresolute, and then, procuring a gun from an adjoining room, committed suicide.

IN February last a tramp printer without a cent in the world walked into the office of the Sun, Sorocco, N. M. After borrowing 25 cents and earning $5 he went prospecting, located a claim, and has lately sold two-thirds of it for $30,000.

GEO. W. CARTER, the new Minister to Venezuela, was once Speaker of the Louisiana House of Representatives. He was Professor of Law in the University of Mississippi at one time, and fortunately speaks Spanish very fluently. He was in the Confederate army, and became a Republican in 1868.

THE annual reports of the Librarians of the numerous free libraries throughout the country for the year 1880 show a decided falling off in patronage, and various reasons are assigned in explanation, but it seems to be owing to the simple fact that the revival of business has allowed book-borrowers less time to read.

STATISTICS of the wine and grape crop for 1880, prepared by the Department of Agriculture at Washington, show that the principal States ranked as follows in order of acres under cultivation:

States.	Acres.	Gallons.	Value.

JOHN MCCULLOUGH is visiting Ireland. He writes: "My success in London has brought forth a score of sisters, cousins, and aunts from the Emerald Isle hitherto unsuspected. I had thought myself merely a potato Irishman, but judging from some of the letters I think I must be descended from Brian and all the Irish Kings."

AN Albany shoe-factory has received an order for a pair of shoes from Miss Mary Wells, of Sandusky, from a pattern marked from the foot as she stood on a paper on the floor. The pattern calls for a shoe 17 inches long, 7¼ wide in the widest part. The ball of the foot is 10 inches around, the instep 18¼, the heel 22 and the ankle 16¼. Miss Wells is but 17 years old, and weighs 160 pounds.

A MARKET has been made in Italy for an article in the manufacture of which Americans — naturalized Americans— have recently excelled—beer. The ravages of phylloxera have tended to increase the price of wine in Italy, and the Italians have taken to beer-drinking as a consequence. The beer manufactured in Italy is rather poor in quality, and the imported article comes principally from this country.

SENATOR LAMAR, of Mississippi, is making an active canvass for re-election, and it is now believed that delegates pledged to vote for his re-election will be chosen in almost every county in the State. Mr. Lamar made an elaborate address at Aberdeen, Miss., recently, in which he took occasion to commend the public course of President Garfield in high terms, and to deplore as a great national calamity a fatal result to his present prostration.

A CORRESPONDENT who has visited Southern Arizona—the region purchased from Mexico by the Gadsden treaty—insists that it contains thousands of acres of fine grazing and agricultural lands (and millions of lead), much good timber, and a number of valuable mines, including those of the Tombstone district. He thinks the product of gold and silver from these mines during the present year will exceed the ten millions originally paid for the land by the United States Government.

A CORRESPONDENT of the New York Tribune, who has been traveling extensively in the South, says he found nowhere, save in Southwestern Texas, any manifestation of prejudice against negro education. But there is still difference of opinion regarding the capacity of the negroes for continued or permanent intellectual improvement. Virginia has now the best public-school system in the South. In the distribution of money for school purposes, whites and blacks are on an equality. The attendance at the schools is increasing rapidly.

INDIANA NEWS.

THE 10-year-old son of C. Coffman, a farmer, living near Muncie, was kicked by a horse and killed.

THOMAS B. WESTON, an old printer, died at Kendallville, aged 82 years. He settled in Noble county in 1836.

BOTH the window and bottle departments of DePauw's glass-works at New Albany will resume on Sept. 1.

THOMAS HIBBS' saloon at Cambridge City was partly demolished by a dynamite torpedo that was exploded in the cellar by unknown parties.

THE stores of Mack Bros. and Morris Jones, at Muncie, were burglarized a few days ago. Over $1,000, chiefly goods, rewarded their nefarious labors.

THE flouring-mills of George Gamble, near Muncie, were totally destroyed by fire. Five hundred bushels of wheat were burned. Loss, $5,000; insurance, $3,000.

THE church furniture works of Haynes, Spencer & Co., at Richmond, Cary & Roulette's planing-mill, and Hugo's engine-governor factory were burned, the loss being $50,000.

A LITTLE daughter of Thomas Williamson, of Jefferson county, had one foot cut entirely off by a mowing machine, she having stepped in front of the sickle while it was in motion.

WHILE Willard Douglass Shanks, son of the Clinton county Treasurer, was driving a team of horses in Frankfort they ran away, throwing him against a fence and killing him instantly.

THE geodetic survey of the State was commenced at New Albany last week. The observatory is four miles north of the city, on the knobs. The survey will extend through the central part of the State and to South Bend.

AT Muncie, while Sol Veneman, a lad 17 years of age, was loading an old pistol it went off, sending a ball into the breast of a boy named Smith, who was standing by, causing a fatal wound, the ball passing entirely through the breast bone.

CLIFFORD CRONK, of Washington county, got mad at one of his horses, hitched to his mowing machine, and got off to switch the horse, and got in front of the reaper, when the horses sprang ahead, cutting off one foot at the ankle.

A TRAMP tried to force an entrance into the house of Mrs. Mollie Hurt a widow, residing near Franklin. Mrs. Hurt sent a bullet through the panel of the door, and it lodged in the brain of the would-be burglar, who died immediately.

SOLON RUSSELL, a well-known lawyer of Charlestown, was run over and killed at Jeffersonville. The locomotive wheels severed the body in twain, cut off one arm and horribly mutilated the lower extremities. Death was instantaneous.

MRS. JACOB MANSDOERFER was burned to death at Fort Wayne by her clothes catching fire from the stove while she was in the kitchen alone preparing supper. Children discovered her while she was burning, but were powerless to assist her in time.

MRS. HARRIET COE, daughter of Mr. W. R. Langston, Connersville, has been taken to the insane asylum. Her insanity ran in the direction of attempts at killing her children, and dates from the grief occasioned by the death of her husband, some years ago.

THE De Pauw American Plate-Glass Works are now turning out an immense plate-glass fermenter for one of the large distilleries at Owensboro, Ky., to be used in the manufacture of sour-mash whisky. It is seventeen feet in height, eight feet in diameter, and the first plate-glass fermenter ever manufactured.

BAD whisky and mean jealousy caused George MacElfresh, of Muncie, to go to the house of his long-divorced wife, kick the doors in, seize her, and threaten to brain her with a huge stone. Her sister, Mary Lee, at this critical moment fired at him and inflicted a dangerous and perhaps fatal wound.

NEAR North Vernon, Jennings county, a team of horses attached to a reaping-machine ran off and threw the driver, John Hulse, in front of the sickle-bar, which, before the horses could be stopped, cut both his arms off, one above the elbow and the other above the wrist, and cut gashes in his breast and shoulder.

THE west span of the iron bridge on Clinton street, over the St. Joe river, Fort Wayne, gave way, falling in the river, caused by the pier settling on a quick-sand bottom and throwing the bridge out of line. Henry Hanna was crossing in his buggy, and went down with it. Although he fell in such a way as not to show apparent injury, death resulted in a few hours, caused by nervous excitement.

THE Ledger-Standard learns of a case of infamous slander in Harrison county, in which a depraved young man attempted to pay court to a young lady, and, being rejected, set his vile tongue to wagging about her. The tales he concocted came to the ears of the father, and so seriously affected him that his life is in danger. The entire family are in deep distress over the stories and at the condition of the father.

THE EMPIRE STATE.

The Democratic members of the New York Legislature, through their Joint Caucus Committee, have issued an address to the Democratic citizens of the State of New York and to the citizens of the State without distinction of party. The address says:

Disorders and quarrels in the Republican majority have separated us from our homes and business for nearly 200 days. The chief cause of this uncalled-for detention was a quarrel with the President of the United States on one side and the Vice President and the two Senators from this State on the other. The source of this discord was the question of official patronage or the spoils of office. The Collector of the Port of New York was forced to resign in the midst of his term from a place where he was serving with general acceptance to the public, and was appointed to a place abroad uncalled for by his friends or by the public, in which he has no experience. This change, against which the merchants of New York protested in large numbers, was made in total disregard of every announced principle of civil-service reform, and was not called for by any principle of political duty nor the interest of the public service. The purpose of the act seemed to be to reward those who had been personally successful in securing the Presidential nomination, and to punish those who had resisted the leading member and members of the National Republican Convention claiming the right of a third term of executive service for a previous President.

The unseemly quarrel at Chicago, in the summer of 1880, was transferred to Washington after the Presidential election at the close of the same year. The same strife has been continued with more bitterness at Albany through the whole of the present session of the Legislature. Is commenced with great vehemence at the Senatorial election in January, when a third-class candidate was nominated and elected over first-class competitors for the first office in the gift of the Legislature, and hardly second to any office in the gift of the people of the State. The office then filled after great strife was vacated by a voluntary resignation, and when it had only been held for less than one-fourth of the first year of the full six years' constitutional term of service.

The man who inspired this resignation was the senior Senator of the State, who had been three times elected to the United States Senate by one party of the State, whose longer service he now refused, and simply owing to the fact of the nomination to the Senate of one chief offender who had opposed his ambition and wishes at Chicago and elsewhere. The useless resignation of these two men has cost the State not only a large amount of money, but, what is more valuable, its honor, dignity and self-respect. Two factions, known by the vulgar but expressive names of "Stalwarts" and "Half-Breeds," have governed the Senate and Assembly of the Republican party and State through the whole session. The Democratic members have many times asked and demanded an appeal to the people, but, by force of numbers, in defiance of public opinion and in denial of the opportunity of a timely public judgment upon the fact of leaving the State without its constitutional representative in the higher branch of Congress, the Republican majority refused to leave the choice of the succession to the people of the State. These demands by the Democratic minority, that an appeal be made to the people, were met by the insulting declaration that the possible choice of Democratic Senators in Congress would be a public calamity to the State, and this after just electing Thomas C. Platt as the successor of Francis Kernan, and after following this succession with the choice of a man named Warner Miller, a member of the present and previous House of Representatives, where he was only conspicuous and notorious as a direct and personal beneficiary of one of the worst monopolies in the country, and where he supported that monopoly by his voice and influence, and with a threat that other public interests should suffer if his special interests in wood pulp and the manufacture of paper were not protected.

Most distinguished and capable men of the dominant party not in public place, apart from Conkling, but including men like Fish, Wheeler, Curtis, Rogers and others, who have served the State with ability, have had to give place to the two men elected to Congress, and their nomination was made an excuse for passing a law to fill the vacancies made by their election, and for no other reason. These special elections thus provoked will be untimely, as they are unnecessary and expensive. The whole Senatorial question at Albany resolved itself into three most discreditable conclusions:

1. A mistrust of the people of the State on the part of the Republican majority in the Legislature.
2. The quarrel over the spoils of office in two or three Republican factions, with practical contempt for every principle belonging to what is known and recognized as civil-service reform.
3. Abuse of power from its long use and misuse, until two of the least capable persons have been drawn from the popular branch of Congress to fill the highest places of the State in the Congress of the United States.

Another and most disgraceful transaction belonging to this Republican Legislature is the evidence of bribery and corruption established upon the evidence of members of the dominant party. A leading Republican Senator of one faction is charged by a member of the Assembly of the same party and the same district of the other faction with offering and paying him $2,000 for a Senatorial vote, and the money was placed in possession of a special committee, and is now in the hands of the State Comptroller. Beyond this fact is the circulation of large sums of money by prominent Republicans pending the Senatorial election, and, as many believe, the intended control of the result of the election. The State of New York with its 5,000,000 of people has been deeply wronged and disgraced both by the Republican Senators' action in Washington and by the action of the Republican party in power at Albany. In the first place, the Chief Magistrate of the Government, for daring to put in practice the principles of Executive right or authority in the choice of a public officer, nearly lost his life.

This sad and terrible crime came not alone through the personal madness of a single man, but from that personal fanaticism which was and is the fruit of greed for public office, and of false and dangerous political education. Now, if ever, is the time to teach all men that public office is the property of the people, and that places of official trust can only be rightfully distributed to men of noble purposes, of pure lives, of wise experience and of unqualified fitness for the work to be performed. The Democratic party of the State desire to inculcate and enforce the doctrine with which the Democratic party came into existence, as when Jefferson declared that the only qualifications for office rested upon the wise, safe and patriotic platform of personal capability, personal honesty and personal fidelity to the constitution.

As members of the Democratic party serving in the Legislature, where in one branch there were but seven Democratic Senators of thirty-two members, and in the Assembly but forty-seven of the 128 members, we also feel called upon to protest against special, personal and partisan legislation against the public interests. The majority in the Assembly, by the combined vote, with the exception of a single member, refused to even permit the reference for discussion alone of three bills carefully prepared and sent to the Judiciary Committee, and providing for absolute reforms in primary meetings of cities, towns and villages of the State where candidates are named and made for every officer elected by the people. In the same malignant spirit, where there were and are Democratic city and local Governments, the wishes of the people were defeated by the combined forces of partisan legislators. Important cases awaiting the decision of State courts were set aside to await the clamors of partisans at home and in the Legislature, and this under a ruling upon points of order and rules of parliamentary right of practice wholly unprecedented in the history of the State or country. The chief source of the present danger is the Federal patronage and the impure administration of the body of Federal officers, whose numbers are now in excess of 100,000 persons, and every year increasing in number. Against this enormous aggressive and personal power there must be eternal vigilance for the right of free education of the children of the people, and the diffusion of that knowledge, and integrity, and patriotism throughout the State and country, which alone can maintain a union among the States and secure peace and prosperity all over the land.

Indocility in Paradise.

There is a story, a little ethical apologue about one Peter, a poor and ignorant teamster, who, dissatisfied with his hard life of drudgery, prayed that he might be allowed the comfort of a walk in Paradise. An angel appeared, and offered to grant his wish if he would promise to study with docility whatever he saw there and to utter no criticism or censure.

Accepting the terms he joyfully accompanied his guide. The first thing he noticed was that the houses of the inhabitants were made of transparent gems. "Why," he exclaimed, "this is a great defect; there can be no privacy; you are all exposed to public gaze!" The angel, with a slight frown and a warning finger, replied: "They who are free from sin and guile need no concealment. The glory of God is rather in exhibiting than in hiding."

They passed on and Peter next perceived several angels bearing golden buckets full of water, which they poured into sieves. He could not restrain his surprise and disapproval. "What a folly!" he cried; "the water runs out as fast as they pour it in." The angel sternly rebuked him for this second violation of his pledge, and showed him that the fine sieves strained out the leaves and other matter floating in the water, which then ran underground in numerous channels, all over the garden, to freshen the flowers and the fruit trees.

Peter hung his head, and proceeded for some time in silence. In a little while, however, they came to a gorgeous chariot whose driver was urging with voice and whip two pairs of horses harnessed on his right and left, one pair headed to the east, the other pair to the west. Peter forgot all his caution and his former experience. Was he not a teamster, and did he not know? In a loud voice he called to the charioteer, "Fasten your horses all in the same direction, or you can never move!" Suddenly a bitter repentance fell on him; for he now saw that the horses had wings; as they strove in contrary directions, the chariot rose into the air as was meant. It was his third offense against the teaching spirit, and the angel put a bandage over his eyes, seized him by the ear, and hustled him out of Paradise into the sterile place whence he had come. The human is admitted into the society of the angelic not to criticise or condemn, but to love and assimilate. The first lesson, therefore, is docility.—"School of Life."

THE story of John Duncan, of Alford, England, the "weaver-botanist," has been received with the warmest sympathy by scientists and scientific societies the world over. Although only a poor weaver, toiling at the loom for his daily bread, he has by a lifetime of industry and earnest devotion to science added very materially to the botanical knowledge of his country; and quite recently presented his large and very valuable herbarium to the university of Aberdeen. His scientific labor, however brought him no pecuniary reward, and extreme old age found him dependent for his daily necessities upon parochial relief. Recently the worthy old botanist's needs have attracted much attention, and a fund now raising for his relief by voluntary subscriptions has reached the respectable proportions of about £325. Her majesty, the Queen, presented £10. The money subscribed is to be placed in the hands of a board of trustees, who will make ample provision for Mr. Duncan during the remainder of his life, and on his death will devote any sum remaining to the promotion of science. The weaver-botanist is now in his eighty-seventh year, and in feeble health.

A case is reported in the New Orleans Medical and Surgical Journal (1852) in which a boy 7 years of age recovered from a wound in the liver, which seems to have been far more serious than the one inflicted upon the President by the pistol-shot fired by Guiteau. A gun was accidentally discharged, which sent a load of large shot into this boy's liver, some of the pellets passing clear through the right lobe. Dr. J. C. Massie, of Houston, Texas, (who reported the case), was called in on the fourth day after the accident, when the wound was gangrenous. After telling the boy's parents that there was not much chance for his recovery, Dr. Massie cut out more than the half of the right lobe of the liver, which had become gangrenous. Contrary to expectation, the boy made a speedy recovery.

Prof. Harris' Radical Cure

FOR

BY YEARS OF USE!

A valuable Discovery and New Departure in Medical Science. A positively effective Remedy for the speedy and permanent Cure for organic weakness—the deplorable disease resulting from indiscreet practices or excesses in youth or at any time of life—by the only true way, viz: Direct Application acting by Absorption, and exerting its specific influence on the Vesicles, Ducts, and Gland, that are unable to perform their natural functions while this disease pervades the human organism. The use of the Pastille is attended with no pain or inconvenience, and does not interfere with the ordinary pursuits of life; it is quickly dissolved and soon absorbed, producing an immediate soothing and restorative effect upon the nervous organizations wrecked from vicious habits or excesses, stopping the drain from the system, restoring the mind to health and sound memory, removing the Dimness of Sight, Confusion of Ideas, Aversion to Society, etc., etc., and the appearance of premature old age usually accompanying this trouble, and restoring the vital forces, where they have been dormant for years. This mode of treatment has stood the test in very severe cases, and is now a pronounced success. Drugs are too much prescribed in this trouble, and, as many can bear witness to, with but little if any permanent good. There is no nonsense about this Preparation. Practical observation enables us to positively guarantee that it will give satisfaction. It has been in general use for several years and we have thousands of testimonials from patients, as to its value, and it is now conceded to be the most rational means yet discovered for reaching and curing this very prevalent trouble, that is well known to be the cause of untold misery to so many, and upon whom quacks prey with their useless nostrums and big fees. The Remedy is put up in neat boxes, of three sizes. No. 1, (enough to last a month,) $3; No. 2, (sufficient to effect a permanent cure, unless in severe cases,) $5; No. 3, lasting over three months, will restore those in the worst condition, $7. Sent by mail, in plain wrappers. Full DIRECTIONS for using will accompany EACH BOX.

Send for Sealed Descriptive Pamphlets giving Anatomical Illustrations and Testimony, which will convince the most skeptical that they can be restored to perfect health, and the vital forces thoroughly re-established same as if never affected. Sold ONLY by A Tale of Three Cities.

CHAPTER I.

Miriam McIntyre stood idle beside a fauteuil in the parlor of her father's stately residence on Beacon Hill, Boston. She was a tall, fair girl, with the pale, rose-tinted complexion that one sees so often in women of gentle birth and proud lineage, and a lithe, willowy figure, every feature of which was set off to perfection by the simple morning wrapper of soft gray cloth cut en-Princesse, with a Pompadour waist and a double row of plaiting down the front, the bottom of the skirt being relieved by a narrow trimming of red, while at her snowy throat nestled a blush rose—she stood out a beautiful picture against the dark background of the room in which the shadows of approaching night were rapidly darkening. One could see by the calm, joyful smile that now and then flitted across her face—each flit being complete in itself—that her thoughts were of a pleasant nature. In three short weeks she would be a happy bride, wedded to a man in whose love her whole life was centered. While thus engaged in rosy meditation some one knocked at the door.

"Come in," said Miriam.

A boy entered the room and handed her a paper. She looked at it closely. It was published in Cleveland.

"Who could have sent it!" she said to herself. The boy had gone.

Opening the pages of the paper her eyes were attracted by an article headed "Matrimonial." She read, at first carelessly, and then with ever-increasing interest, her eyes fixed upon the print with a wild look. At length she gave a shriek of horror and fell senseless on the fauteuil.

What she had been reading was an account of the marriage of her betrothed. He had basely deserted her.

The girl's shriek brought her mother to the room, and the unconscious form was borne away to bed.

* * * * * * *

The next morning her hair had turned white!

CHAPTER II.

Beatrice Malone stood in the parlor of her father's home in Chicago. Her complexion and dress were all right, same as the other girl's. A boy came in and handed her a paper. She looked around for a fauteuil, but the chamber-maid was bumping the dust out of it in the back yard. Beatrice decided not to faint. The paper contained an account of the marriage of the man to whom she was betrothed. She gazed at the print with a wild look, and saying softly to herself. "I was afraid that sucker would get away," began eating an apple. The noise brought her mother to the room. She handed her the paper.

* * * * * * *

The next morning, after the faithless lover came back from Cleveland, his eyes turned black and blue and his nose was spread all over his face. He had seen her brother.—[Chicago Tribune.

John Winthrop and Tobacco.

In the year 1628 he was smitten when in London, with a "hot malignant fever," from which he recovered with difficulty. He notes in his diary that his illness was sanctified to him, and also that "among other benefits I reaped by it this was one—deliverance from the bondage wherein I was fallen by the immoderate use and love of tobacco, so as I gave it clean over." There are several references to tobacco in such of his letters as have been preserved. Two years before his illness he informed his eldest son in London that he wanted "some leaf tobacco and pipes." Next year he again wrote from Groton. "We want a little tobacco. I had very good for seven shillings a pound at a grocer's by Holborn bridge. There be two shops together. It was at that which was the farthest from the bridge, toward the conduit. If you tell him it was for him that bought half a pound of Verina and a pound of Virginia of him last term he will use you well. "Send me half a pound of Virginia." The consumption of tobacco at Groton Manor must have been considerable. Nor was Winthrop the only smoker. His wife, writing to him when in London, says: "My good mother commends her love to you all and thanks for her tobacco." Winthrop's renunciation of the use of tobacco, after his serious illness, does not seem to have been absolute. In a letter written to his wife, at Boston, nine years later he ask her to send him some wearing apparel and adds, "I pray thee also send me six or seven leaves of tobacco, dried and powdered." Many of his fellow-Puritans regarded the practice of smoking with an aversion equal to that of James I believing it to be a subtle device of Satan to ruin mankind. Yet the example of such a man as Winthrop proved to them that piety was not inconsistent with smoking, while his experience made him feel that "the immoderate use and love of tobacco" was the snare to be deprecated and avoided. Many persons will admire him none the less when they learn that in common with his great contemporary, John Milton, he thoroughly enjoyed a pipe of tobacco.—[Good Words.

Little Miami Pearls.

D. K. Anderson and George L. Clearer have in their posession one of the largest pearls ever found in the Little Miami river. It is a very good mate for the celebrated Roberts pearl, which was sold to the president of the Adams express company for seven fifty dollar bills, being but two grains lighter, and weighing twenty-three grains. It is more brilliant than the Roberts pearl, and in color a clear sky-blue. It is said to be worth about as much as the Roberts jewel. This is the first pearl of any importance that has been taken out of the Little Miami this season.—[Enquirer.

Holloway's Pills.

Never despair—something that never fails—Fever and Ague—To the sick it is of little consequence how they are cured, whether from a rational view of the disease or by the rules defined for the guidance of the profession, so long as the cure is certain and expeditious. To a suffering man the question on the relative merits of quinine or calomel is uninteresting. The faculty may wrangle and discuss their various theories, but Dr. Holloway's treatment dispells doubt ere the disciples of Escalapius have finished the first stage. Holloway's Pills are the only remedies which effect a speedy and radical cure without danger of a relapse. Read the advertisement elsewhere.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the signature of J. HAYDOCK surrounds each box of Pills and Ointment. Boxes at 25 cents, 62 cents and $1 each.

How Watches are Made.

It will be apparent to any one, who will examine a SOLID GOLD WATCH, that aside from the necessary thickness for engraving and polishing, a large porportion of the precious metal used is needed only to stiffen and hold the engraved portions in place, and supply the necessary solidity and strength. The surplus gold is actually needless so far as UTILITY and beauty are concerned. In JAMES BOSS' PATENT GOLD WATCH CASES, this WASTE of precious metal is overcome, and the SAME SOLIDITY AND STRENGTH produced at from one-third to one half of the usual cost of solid cases. This process is of the most simple nature, as follows: a plate of nickle composition metal, especially adapted to the purpose, has two plates of SOLID GOLD soldered one on each side. The three are then passed between polished steel rollers, and the result is a strip of heavy plated composition, from which the cases, backs, centres, bezels etc., are cut and shaped by suitable dies and formers. The gold in these cases is sufficiently thick to admit of all kinds of chasing, engraving and enameling; the engraved cases have been carried until worn perfectly smooth by time and use without removing the gold.

THIS IS THE ONLY CASE MADE WITH TWO PLATES OF SOLID GOLD AND WARRANTED BY SPECIAL CERTIFICATE.

For sale by all Jewelers. Ask for Illustrated Catalogue, and to see warrant.

AN ANGEL.

At breakfast late, her pouting lip
Tells nothing suits her ladyship.
Curl-papers fill her frowzy hair;
Her sloven dress is worse for wear;
Her face is pale and scarcely clean,
And she—well, she is sweet sixteen.

Piano bangs she till the noon,
Which, like herself, is out of tune;
And then straggles down to munch
Some cake and pickles for her lunch.
She scolds her ma; with sister spats;
And calls the children horrid brats.

At eve—a transformation scene.
In dress she looks a radiant queen;
Her cheeks are red, her eyes are bright,
Her smile is sweet and all delight.
What means this change? Oh! well, you see
Her beau is coming after tea.

In parlor sits T. Edward Jones,
Charmed by his "angel's" gentle tones,
And dazzled by her beauty, while
She eats his candies with a smile.
Poor fellow! ere he pops may he See Sarah Jones as others see.

A Relic of the War.

We publish by request, the following extracts from the last number of the "Daily Citizen," a rebel sheet published at Vicksburg at the time of the surrender. As will be seen by the heading, it is dated July 2d, 1863, or two days before the capitulation. The closing "note," which is added July 4th, is evidently the work of some Yankee printer, who entered the town with the victorious army. As showing the condition of the garrison and people inside of the town during the siege, as well as their hopes and fears, the article will be read with interest even at this date. We follow the copy as it stood in the original issue.

THE DAILY CITIZEN.

J. M. Swords, - - - - - Proprietor

VICKSBURG, MISS.

THURSDAY, JULY 2, 1863.

Mrs. Cisco was instantly killed on Monday, on Jackson road. Mrs. Cisco's husband is now in Virginia, a member of Moody's artillery, and the death of such a loving, affectionate and dutiful wife will be a loss to him irreparable

We are indebted to Major Gillespie for a steak of Confederate beef alias meat. We have tried it, and can assure our friends that if it is necessary, they need have no scruples at eating the meat. It is sweet, savory and tender, and so long as we have a mule left we are satisfied our soldiers will be content to subsist on it.

Jere Askew, one of our most esteemed merchant citizens, was wounded at the works in the rear of our city a few days since, and breathed his last on Monday. Mr. Askew was a young man of strict integrity, great industry and honor to his family and friends. He was a member of Cowan's artillery, and by the strict discharge of his duties and his obliging disposition won the confidence and esteem of his entire command. May the blow his family has sustained be mitigated by Him who doeth all things well.

Grant's forces did a litle firing on Tuesday afternoon, but the balance of the day was comparatively quiet. Yesterday morning they were very still, and continued so until early in the afternoon, when they sprung a mine on the left of our center, and opened fire along the line for some distance. We have not been able to ascertain anything definitely as to our loss, but as our officers were on the lookout for this move of the enemy, the expectation of the Yankees was not realized by a great deal.

Among many good deeds we hear spoken of with pride by our citizens, we cannot refrain from mentioning the case of F. Kiser. The gentleman, having more corn than he thought was necessary to last him during the siege of this place, portioned off what would do him for the brief interval that would ensue before the arrival of succor to our garrison, and since that time has relieved the wants of many families free of charge! May he long live and prosper, and his name be handed down to posterity, when the siege of Vicksburg is written, as one in whose breast the "milk of human kindness" has not dried up.

Porter is enjoying a season of rest and his men are doubtless obliged to him for his kind consideration of their welfare. On Tuesday he fired a few shells from his parrots, and kept his men tolerably busy sharp-shooting across the river, with no other result than might have been expected. The mortars have not been uses for nearly forty-eight hours. Poor fool, he might as well give up the vain aspiration he entertains of capturing our city or exterminating our people, and return to his masters to receive the reward such a gasconading dolt will meet at the hands of the unappreciative Government at Washington.

DEATH OF LIEUT.-COL. GRIFFIN.—General Smith's impetuous division seems singularly unfortunate. He has lost many gallant men whose valor and worth the siege has fully developed, and whose death is a great public calamity. Lieut.-Col. Griffin, commanding the 31st Louisiana regiment was killed on Saturday. He was a popular and efficient officer. Gifted by nature with undaunted courage, indomitable resolution and energy, he was also possessed of quick determination, keen glance and coolness in danger, which are the most essential qualities of an officer, while by his mingled firmness and clemency of conduct, he won the confidence and good will of his men. May the soft wind murmur sweet requiems o'er his manes, and the twilight dews fall gently as an angel's tear-drop and moisten his turfy bed.

If aught would appeal to the heart of stone of extortioners with success, the present necessities of our citizens would do so. It is needless to attempt to disguise from the enemy of our own people that our wants are great, but still we can conscientiously assert our belief that there is plenty within our lines, by an exercise of prudence, to last until long after succor reaches us. We are satisfied that there are numerous persons within our city who have breadstuffs secreted, and dealing it out, at the most exorbitant figures, to those who had not the foresight or means at their command to provide for the exigency now upon us. A rumor has reached us that parties in this city have been, and are now, selling flour at five dollars per pound! molasses at ten dollars a gallon! and corn at ten dollars per bushel! We have not as yet proved the fact upon the parties accused, but this allusion to the subject may induce some of our citizens to ascertain whether such prices have been paid, to whom; if so let a brand be placed upon their brow, but let it be seared into their very brain, that humanity may scorn and shun them as they would the portals of hell itself.

We have heretofore refrained from alluding to a matter which has been a source of extreme annoyance and loss to our citizens. We refer to the lax discipline of some of our officers in allowing some of their men to prowl around, day and night, and purloin fruit, vegetables, chickens, etc., from our denizens, and, in the majority of cases, from those whose chief subsistence is derived therefrom. This charge is not confined to those at the works, but it is equally, if not mainly, attributable to the wagoners and others in charge of animals. Several cases have come to our knowledge wherein the offenders have, in open daylight, entered premises, seized cattle and other things, and defied the owners to the teeth. We are pained to learn that an esteemed citizen of Vicksburg, Wm. Potterfield, was under the necessity, in protecting his property, to wound one or two soldiers and deprive another of his life. We fully appreciate the fatigue, hardships and privation to which our men are subjected; but upon inquiry it may be ascertained that our city is second to none in contributing to the welfare of those gallant spirits who risk their life and limb for the achievement of an end that will make us one of the most honored people of the earth, and such conduct of which we complain is but base ingratitude. A soldier has his honor as much at stake as when a civillian; then let him preserve his good name and reputation with the same jealous care as before he entered his country's ranks. But so long as this end is lost sight of, so long we may expect to chronicle scenes of blood-shed among those of our own people. We make this public exposure, mortifying as it is to us, with the hope that a salutary improvement in matters will be made by our military authorities.

ON DIT.—That the great Ulysses—the Yankee Generalissimo, surnamed Grant—expressed his intention of dining in Vicksburg on Saturday next, and celebrating the 4th of July by a grand dinner and so forth. When asked if he would invite Gen. Jo Johnston to join he said, "No! for fear there would be a row at the table." Ulysses must get into the city before he dines in it. The way to cook a rabbit is, "first catch the rabbit," &c.

The Yanks outside of our city are considerably on the sick list. Fever, dysentery and disgust are their companions, and Grant is their master. The boys are deserting daily and crossing the river in the region of Warrington, cussing Grant and abolitionists generally. The boys are down upon the earth delving, the burrowing, the bad water and the hot weather.

VICTIMIZED.—We learn of an instance wherein a "knight of the quill" and a "disciple of the black art," with malice in their eyes, ruthlessly put a period to the existence of a venerable feline, that has for a time, not within the recollection of the "oldest inhabitant," faithfully discharged the duties to be expected of him to the terror of sundry vermin in this neighborhood. Poor, defunct Thomas was then prepared, not for the grave, but the pot, and several friends invited to partake of a nice rabbit. As a matter of course, no one would wish to wound the feelings of another, especially in these times, by refusing a cordial invitation to dinner, and the guests assisted in consuming the poor animal with a relish that did honor to their epicurean taste. The "solid" assure us that the meat was delicious, and that pussy must look for safety.

NOTE.

JULY 4th, 1863.

Two days bring about great changes. The banner of the Union floats over Vicksburg. Gen. Grant has "caught the rabbit;" he has dined at Vicksburg, and he did bring his dinner with him. The "Citizen" lives to see it. For the last time it appears on "Wall-paper." No more will it eulogize the luxury of mule-meat and fricasseed kitten—urge Southern warriors to such diet never more. This is the last wall-paper edition, and it is, excepting this note, from the type as we found them. It will be valued hereafter as a curiosity.

How to Eat a Watermelon.

[Baltimore American.]

There are many ways of eating melons, all of which are good, but some better than others. The primitive way, still ardently pursued by small boys of all colors, is to get into somebody else's patch and "bust" one open, and then and there bury the countenance in it. Another way is to cut it in two parts, give your neighbor one-half and a spoon, and make similar provision for yourself. This is called an Eastern Sho' dialogue. A great deal of substantial courting can be done in this way. The hotel plan of cutting it like a tulip, and putting a lump of ice inside, is the worst way. Ice should not touch the pulp. The best way is to bury it in ice for two days. It takes fully that time to get all the heat out of it. Then cut it lengthwise into about four pieces, and eat it at night—that and nothing else. Watermelons are unwholesome, however, if plucked too green, or if much over-ripe. Some unfortunate people are unable to eat them at all. But the happy average man can place himself on the outside of half a watermelon without any gastric disturbance. People, however, deal unjustly with this fruit sometimes by eating a hearty dinner first, and then topping off with a melon, and then if a moral earthquake sets up in the interior, they charge it to the melon. But this is clearly unjust. The watermelon should be taken between meals. It was intended as an episode—an interlude—a romance without words—a nocturne in green and red—not to be mingled with bacon and greens. Its indulgence leaves a certain epigastral expansion, but this is painless and evanescent. The remedy is to loosen the waistband, and—take another slice.

Rheumatic Diseases.

These ailments follow from torpid liver and costive bowels; the skin, bowels and kidneys failing in their proper work, an acrid poison is formed in the blood, which is the occasion of these acute diseases. Kidney-Wort produces healthy action of all secretive organs, and throws off the rheumatic poison. Equally efficient in liquid or dry form.—[Inter-Ocean.

Cured of Drinking.

"A young friend of mine was cured of an insatible thirst for liquor, which had so prostrated him that he was unable to do any business. He was entirely cured by the use of Hop Bitters. It allayed all that burning thirst; took away the appetite for liquor; made his nerves steady, and he has remained a sober and steady man for more than two years, and has no desire to return to his cups; I know of a number of others that have been cured of drinking by it."—From a leading R. The Unfinished Part of Earth.

The earth has been a long time in building, according to geology. To gather up the nebulous matter, harden it so that it would stick together, mould it with fire and cool it with water, has taken some hundred thousands of years. But there is evidently a part of it that is not finished yet. It is all that section that lies in and along the South Pacific. There is continually going on in this region some of the processes that were used millions of years ago in building the other parts of the earth. Occasionally the whole pacific cost of South America is lifted up and let down again, as though nature had some difficulty in fixing its location and in fastening it on the foundation. Now and then an island suddenly bobs up serenely in this half-baked quarter of the world, seems to sniff the marine air, and then bobs down again. There is a general appearance of unsettledness about the whole of this region that affects, more or less, contiguous territory. It was in Western Mexico, many years ago, that Jorilla, an active volcano, suddenly thrust itself in an inhabited plain, and proceeded to do busines, to the consternation of the people thereabouts. Other volcanoes, of the same family no doubt, from time to time abruptly stick their peaks up out of the Pacific ocean, and blow and bellow away as if they wanted a chance with Popocatapetl and Cotopaxi. There is never any telling what will happen in the South Pacific. Earthquakes and tidal waves are the regular amusements of the inhabitants. Some years since the earth quietly opened in Chili and threw up the mummified corpses of a whole tribe of the ancient Peruvians. After airing them a short time it swallowed them up again. Our minister, Gen. Tom. Nelson, saw this, and asserts it boldly. Strangers are taken some miles inland to see the hulk of a large man-of-war which was borne there years ago by a playful tidal wave in a moment of frollicsomeness. Just now old Mauna Loa is on. This is a mastodon among volcanoes. It does nothing in the pitiful style of Ætna or Vesuvius. It is as far ahead of Hecla and Stromboli as the megatherium was above our walrus. It is evidently the last representative of that pre-adamitic time when our elephants were but insects on the earth and everything was colossal—when mastodons browsed from the top leaves of the big trees of Calaveras, and everything from mountains to men was Titantic.

Any one anxious to see the process of world-building should repair at once to Honolulu. Think of a stream of glowing lava five miles long and several hundreds of yards wide slowly creeping towards the sea. The Honolulu Commercial Advertiser says:

"A stream of lava, liquid as water, and glowing with a white heat, broke from the face of the flow and ran down a narrow and tortuous gulch, nearly a mile in length, making such speed that the visitors had to make haste to avoid it. At the foot of the gulch is a hollow which often fills up with water, making a lagoon. This is now being filled with lava, and and has checked the onward flow which had threatened the mill and other buildings at Waiakea in such a manner as to lead the manager to remove all portable stores, and to take measures to be in readiness to remove the plant itself to a place of safety."

This is a very sublime sight, no doubt—to a man up a tree—provided the tree was not in the track of the stream. It shows how an insignificant island may grow into a continent—how the world was built—its foundations set in granite, and its floors of marble laid. If Mauna Loa should continue to vomit this way for a year, and it seems to be very sick, the geography of the earth's surface will be changed as much as its entrils are.—[Indianapolis Journal.

Comeskey's Corners.

(Last Week.)

Mr. J. Kruse's oldest daughter, of Fort Wayne, is visiting with him this week.

Mr. C. Comeskey went to his rest Tuesday night as well as usual, and on wakening in the morning thought he had the measles, but after investigating the matter it proved to be mosquito bites.

Mr. Charles Gangare has given up his notion of going to Nebraska, and is now learning to be cook.

Several of our young friends visited Dunton lake Sunday, for a boat ride. A good time is reported. POP.

THE GOOD PHYSICIAN.

BY DR. OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.

How blest is he who knows no meaner strife
Than art's long battle with the foes of life!
No doubt assails him, doing still his best,
And trusting kindly nature for the rest;
No mocking conscience tears the thin disguise
That wraps his breast, and tells him that he lies.
He comes; the languid sufferer lifts his head
And smiles a welcome from his weary bed;
He speaks: what music like the tones that tell
"Past is the hour of danger—all is well!"
How can he feel the petty stings of grief
Whose cheering presence always brings relief?
What ugly dreams can trouble his repose
Who yields himself to soothe another's woes?
Hour after hour the busy day has found
The good physician on his lonely round;
Mansion and hovel, low and lofty door,
He knows, his journeys every path explore—
Where the cold blast has struck with deadly chill
The sturdy dweller on the storm-swept hill,
Where by the stagnant marsh the sickening gale
Has blanched the poisoned tenants of the vale,
Where crushed and maimed the bleeding victim lies,
Where madness raves, where melancholy sighs,
And where the solemn whisper tells too plain
That all his science, all his art were vain.

How sweet his fireside when the day is done,
And cares have vanished with the setting sun!
Evening at last its hour of respite brings,
And on his couch his weary length he flings.
Soft be thy pillow, servant of mankind,
Lulled by an opiate art could never find;
Sweet be thy slumber—thou hast earned it well—
Pleasant thy dreams! Clang! goes the midnight bell!
Darkness and storm! the home is far away
That waits his coming ere the break of day;
The snow-clad pines their wintry plumage toss—
Doubtful the frozen stream his road must cross;
Deep lie the drifts, the slanted heaps have shut
The hardy woodman in his mountain hut—
Why should thy softer frame the tempest brave?
Hast thou no life, no health, to lose or save?
Look! read the answer in his patient's eyes—
For him no other voice when suffering cries;
Deaf to the gale that all around him blows,
A feeble whisper calls him—and he goes.

Or seek the crowded city—summer's heat
Glares burning, blinding, in the narrow street,
Still, noisome, deadly, sleeps the envenomed air,
Unstirred the yellow flag that says "Beware!"
Tempt not thy fate—one little moment's breath
Bears on its viewless wings the seeds of death;
Thou at whose door the gilded chariots stand,
Whose dear-bought skill unclasps the miser's hand,
Turn from thy fatal quest, nor cast away
That life so precious; let a meaner prey
Feed the destroyer's hunger; live to bless
Those happier homes that need thy care no less.

Smiling he listens; has he then a charm
Whose magic virtues peril can disarm?
No safeguard this; no amulet he wears;
Too well he knows that nature never spares
Her truest servant, powerless to defend
From her own weapons her unshrinking friend.
He dares the fate the bravest well might shun,
Nor asks reward save only Heaven's "Well done!"

Such are the toils, the perils that he knows,
Days without rest and nights without repose,
Yet all unheeded for the love he bears
His art, his kind, whose every grief he shares.

RETIRING FROM BUSINESS.

What the Colonel's business was nobody knew, nor did anybody care particularly. He purchased for cash only, and never grumbled at the price of anything he wanted. Who could ask more than that?

Curious people occasionally wondered how, when it had been fully two years since the Colonel, with every one else, abandoned Dutch Creek to the Chinese, he managed to spend money freely and to lose considerably at cards and horse-races. In fact, the keeper of that one of the Challenge Hill saloons which the Colonel did not patronize was once heard to wonder, absent-mindedly, whether the Colonel hadn't a money mill somewhere where he turned out eagles and "slugs" (the coast name for $50 gold pieces).

When so important a personage as a bar-keeper indulged publicly in the idea, the inhabitants of Challenge Hill, like all good Californians everywhere, considered themselves in duty bound to give it grave consideration; so, for a few days, certain industrious professional gentlemen, who won money of the Colonel, carefully weighed some of the brightest pieces, and tested them with acids, and sawed them in two, and retired them, and melted them up, and had the lumps assayed.

The result was a complete vindication of the Colonel and a loss of considerable custom to the indiscreet bar-keeper.

The Colonel was as good-natured a man as had ever been known on Challenge Hill, but, being mortal, the Colonel had his occasional times of despondency, and one of them occurred after a series of races in which he had staked his all on his bay mare Tipsie and lost.

Looking reproachfully at his beloved animal, he failed to heed the aching void of his pockets, and drinking deeply, swearing eloquently and glaring defiantly at all mankind were equally unproductive of coin.

The boys at the saloon sympathized most feelingly with the Colonel. They were unceasing in their invitations to drink, and they exhibited considerable Christian forbearance when the Colonel savagely dissented with every one who advanced any proposition, no matter how incontrovertible. But unappreciated sympathy grows decidedly tiresome to the giver, and it was with a feeling of relief that the boys saw the Colonel stride out of the saloon, mount Tipsie and gallop furiously away.

Riding on horseback has always been considered an excellent sort of exercise, and riding is universally admitted to be one of the most healthful means of exhilaration in the world; but when a man is so absorbed in his exercise that he will not stop to speak to his friend, and when his exhilaration is so complete that he turns his eyes from well-meaning thumbs pointing significantly into doorways through which a man has often passed while seeking bracing influences, it is only natural that people should express some wonder.

The Colonel was well known at Toddy Flat, Come Hand, Blazer's, Murderer's Bar and several other villages through which he passed. As no one had been seen to precede him, betting men were soon offering odds that the Colonel was running away from somebody.

Strictly speaking they were wrong, but they won all the money that had been staked against them, for within half an hour there passed over the same road an anxious-looking individual, who reined up in front of the principal saloon of each place and inquired if the Colonel had passed.

Had the gallant Colonel known that he was followed, and by whom, there certainly would have been an extra election held at the latter place very shortly after, for the pursuer was the constable, and for all officers of the law the Colonel possessed hatred.

On galloped the Colonel, following the stage road, which threaded the old mining-camps on Dutch creek, but suddenly he turned out of the road and urged his horse through the young pines and bushes which grew thickly by the road, while the constable galloped on to the next camp.

There seemed to be no path through the thicket into which the Colonel had turned, but Tipsie walked between the trees and shrubs as if they were familiar objects of his stable-yard.

Suddenly a voice from the bushes shouted:

"What's up?"

"Business—that's what."

"It's time," replied the voice, and its owner—a bearded six-footer—emerged from the bushes and stroked Tipsie's nose with the freedom of an old acquaintance. "We ain't had a nip since last night, and there ain't a cracker or a handful of flour in the shanty. The old gal go back on yer?"

"Yes," replied the Colonel, ruefully, "lost every blasted race! 'Twasn't her fault—bless her—she done her level best. Ev'ry body to home?"

"You bet," said the man. "All been a prayin' for yer to turn up with the rocks an' somethin' with more color than spring water. Come on."

The man led the way, and Tipsie and the Colonel followed, and the trio suddenly found themselves before a log hut, in front of which sat three solemn, disconsolate individuals, who looked appealingly to the Colonel.

"Mack'll tell ye how 'twas, fellers," said the Colonel, meekly, "while I picket the mare."

The Colonel was absent but a few moments, but when he returned each of the four were attired in pistols and knife, while Mack was distributing some dominoes made from a rather dirty flour sack.

"Tain't so late as all that, is it?" inquired the Colonel.

"Better be an hour ahead than a miss in this ere night," said one of the four. "I ain't been so thirsty since I came round the Horn in '50, an' we run short of water. Somebody 'll get hurt if there ain't any bitters in the old concern—they will, or my name ain't Perkins."

"Don't count on your chickens 'fore they've hatched, Perky," said one of the crowd as he adjusted the domino under the rim of his hat. "S'posin' there should be too many for us?"

"Stiddy, stiddy, Cranks!" remonstrated the Colonel. "Nobody ever gets along ef they 'low themselves to be skeered."

"Fact," chimed in the smallest and thinnest man in the party. "The Bible says somethin' mighty hot 'bout that, I disremember dactly how it goes, but I've hern Parson Buzzy, down to Maine, preach a ripplin' old sermon many a time. The old man never thought what a comfort them sermons wus agoin' to be to a road agent, though. That time we stopped Slim Mike's stage, and he didn't have no more manners than to draw on me, them sermons wuz a perfect blessing to me—the thorns of 'em cleaned my head as quick as a cocktail. An'——"

"I don't want to dispute Logroller's pious strain," interrupted the Colonel, "but ez it's Old Black that's arrivin' today instead of Slim Mike, and ez it's Old Black allers made his time, hadn't we better vamoose?"

The door of the shanty was hastily closed, and the men filed through the thicket until near the road, when they marched rapidly on in parallel lines with it. After about half an hour Perkins, who was leading, halted, and wiped his perspiring brow with his shirt sleeve.

"Fur enough from home now," said he. "'Taint no use bein' a gentleman if yer have to work too hard."

"Safe enough, I reckon," replied the Colonel. "We'll do the usual; I'll halt 'em; Logroller, 'tend to the driver; Cranks, take the boot, and Mack and Perk take right and left. An' I know it's tough—but considerin' how everlastin' eternal hard up we are, I reckon we'll have to ask contribution from the ladies, too, ef ther's any aboard—eh, boys?"

"Reckon so," replied Logroller, with a chuckle that seemed to inspire even his black domino with a merry wrinkle or two. "What's the use of women's rights, ef they don't ever have a chance of exercis'n 'em? Hevin' ther purses borrowed 'ud show 'em the full doctrine in a bran-new light."

"Come, come, boys," interposed the Colonel, "thar's the crack of Old Black's whip; pick yer bush—quick! All jump when I whistle."

Each man secreted himself near the roadside. The stage came swinging along handsomely; those inside were laughing heartily at something, and Old Black was just giving a delicate touch to the flank of the off leader, when the Colonel gave a shrill, quick whistle, and five men sprang into the road.

The horses stopped as suddenly as if it were a matter of common occurrence. Old Black dropped the reins, crossed his legs and stared into the sky, and the passengers all put out their heads with a rapidity equaled only by that with which they withdrew them as they saw the dominos and revolvers of the road agents.

"Seems to be something the matter, gentlemen," said the Colonel blandly, as he opened the door. "Won't you please get out? Don't trouble yourself to draw, 'cos my friend here's got his weapon cocked an' his finger's rather nervous. Ain't got a handkerchief, hev you?" he asked of the first passenger who descended from the stage. "Hev? Well, now, that's lucky. Just put yer hands behind yer—so—that's it." And the unfortunate man's hands were securely tied behind in an instant.

The remaining passengers were treated with similar courtesy, and the Colonel and his friends examined the pockets of the captives. Old Black remained unmolested, for who ever heard of a stage-driver having money?

"Boys," said the Colonel, calling his brother agents aside and comparing receipts, "'tain't much of a haul, but there's only one woman, and she's old enough to be a feller's grandmother."

"Like enough she'll pan out more than all the rest of the stage put together," growled Cranks, carefully testing the thickness of the case of a gold watch. "Just like the low-lived deceitfulness of some folks to hire an old woman to carry their money, so it'd go safer. Mebbe what she's got ain't nothin' to some folks that's got hosses that kin win money at races, but—"

The Colonel abruptly ended the conversation, and approached the stage. He was very chivalrous, but Cranks' sarcastic reference to Tipsie needed avenging, and, as he could not consistently with business arrangements put an end to Cranks, the only lady would have to suffer.

"I beg your pardon, ma'am," said the Colonel, raising his hat politely with one hand, while he drew open the coach door with the other, "but we are taking up a collection for some deserving object. We was goin' to make the gentlemen fork over the hull amount, but as they ain't got enough we will have to bother you."

The old lady trembled, felt for her pocket-book and raised her veil. The Colonel looked into her face, slammed the stage door, and, sitting on the hub of one of the wheels, stared vacantly into space.

"No—yes," said the Colonel, dreamily. "That is, untie 'em, and let the stage go ahead," he continued, springing to his feet. "I'll hurry back to the cabin." And the Colonel dashed into the bushes and left his followers so paralyzed with astonishment that Old Black afterward remarked that if ther'd been anybody to mind the horses he could have cleaned out the hull crowd with his whip.

The passengers, now relieved of their weapons, were unbound, allowed to enter the stage and the door was slammed, upon which Old Black picked up his reins as if he laid them down at the station while the horses were being changed, then he cracked his whip and the stage rolled off, while the Colonel's party hurried back to the hut, fondly inspecting, as they went, certain flasks they had obtained while transacting their business with the occupants of the stage.

Great was the surprise of the road agents as they entered their hut, for there stood the Colonel in a clean white shirt, and in a suit of clothing made up from the limited spare wardrobes of the other members of the band.

But the suspicious Cranks speedily subordinated his wonder to his prudence as, laying on the table a heavy purse, he exclaimed:

"Come, Colonel, business before pleasure; let's divide and scatter. Ef anybody should hear about it an' find our trail, an' ketch the traps in our possession, they might—"

"Divide yourselves!" said the Colonel, with a white abruptness and a great oath; "I want none of it."

"Colonel," said Perkins, removing his own domino and looking anxiously into the leader's face, "be you sick? Here's some bully brandy which I found in the passengers' pockets."

"It hain't nothin'," replied the Colonel, with averted eyes. "I'm goin' and I'm retirin' from business forever."

"Ain't agoin' to turn evidence?" cried Cranks, grasping a pistol lying upon the table.

"I'm agoin' to make a lead mine of you ef you don't take that back!" roared the Colonel, with a bound that caused Cranks to drop the pistol and retire precipitately, apologizing as he went. "I'm agoin' to attend to my own business, and that's enough to keep anybody busy. Somebody lend me $50 till I see him agin."

Perkins pressed the money in the Colonel's hand, and within two minutes the Colonel was on Tipsie's back and galloped off in the direction the stage had taken.

He overtook it, passed it, and still he galloped on.

The people at Mud Gulch knew the Colonel well, and made it a rule never to be astonished at anything he did; but they made an exception to the rule when the Colonel canvassed the principal bar-rooms for men who wished to buy a horse, and when a gambler who was flush obtained Tipsie for twenty slugs—only $1,000, when the Colonel had always said there was not gold enough on top of ground to buy her—Mud Gulch experienced a decided sensation.

But when the Colonel, after remaining in the barber shop for half an hour, emerged with his face clean shaved and his hair nicely trimmed and parted, betting was so wild that a cool-headed sporting man speedily made a fortune by betting against every theory that had been advanced.

Then the Colonel made a tour of the stores, and fitted himself up with a new suit of clothes, carefully eschewing all of the gorgeous patterns and pronounced colors so dear to the heart of the average miner. He bought a new hat and put on a pair of boots and pruned his finger nails and, stranger than all, he mildly declined all invitations to drink.

As the Colonel stood at the door of the principal saloon, where the stage always stopped, the Challenge Hill constable was seen to approach the Colonel and tap him on the shoulder, when all the men who had bet that the Colonel was dodging somebody claimed the stakes. But those who stood near the Colonel heard the constable say:

"Colonel, I take it all back. When I seed you come out of Challenge Hill, it come to me that you might be in the road-agent business. But when I seed you sell Tipsie I knew I was on the wrong trail. I wouldn't suspect you now if all the stages in the country was robbed; and I'll give you satisfaction any way you want it."

"It's all right," said the Colonel, with a smile. The constable afterward said that nobody had any idea of how curiously the Colonel smiled when his beard was off.

Suddenly the stage pulled up to the door with a crash, and the male passengers hurried into the saloon in a state of utter indignation and impecuniosity.

The story of the robbery attracted everybody, and during the excitement the Colonel slipped out quietly and opened the door of the stage. The old lady started, and cried:

"George!"

And the Colonel jumped in the stage, and, putting his arm tenderly around the trembling form of the old lady, exclaimed:

"Mother!"—Bret Harte.

In the South of France caged decoy birds have their eyes put out, and they sing to the rays of the rising sun which they feel but cannot see, and they attract free birds from the woods. The latter birds—thrushes, nightingales, linnets, woodpeckers, robins, blackbirds, yellowhammers and larks—are mercilessly shot, twenty or thirty at a time, and are used for food. There is also much netting of these birds. Insects are increasing in number. An effort is being made to stop the slaughter of the birds.

FACTS FOR THE CURIOUS.

AT Cape Island, N. J., the sea has gained on the shore fully a mile since 1776. The tides on the eastern shore of the State are observably growing higher.

DURING the reign of Napoleon I. a book of birds for children was suppressed because it contained the phrase: "The cock is rather the tyrant than the chieftain of the farm-yard."

EVERY shell fired by an army during siege operations costs, with the powder with which the mortar is charged, the sum of eight dollars—enough to support a poor family for a fortnight.

THE lead used in sounding from a vessel usually weighs about fourteen pounds, but in deep-sea soundings a weight of not less than 150 pounds is frequently employed. Wire has been largely used for a line, as it makes less friction in sinking through the water. With hemp rope a sinker of 300 weight is sometimes twenty minutes in reaching the bottom in 1,500 fathoms of water, so great is the friction of the line.

THE oldest monument in the world is in the Ashmolean Museum at Oxford. This is the lintel stone of a tomb which formed the last resting-place of an officer who lived in the time of King Sent, of the second dynasty, whose fate is fixed by M. Mariette more than 6,000 years ago. The stone is covered with that delicate and finished sculpture which distinguished the early periods of Egyptian history, and was immeasurably superior to the stiff and conventional art of the latter ages of Egypt, which we are accustomed to see in European museums.

THE Japanese are remarkably exempt from deformed feet. The reason of this is to be found in the shoes they wear. The wooden sandals worn in Japan have a separate compartment for the great toe, and make a clanking noise on the streets. Straw slippers are also worn, and a traveler setting out on a journey will strap a supply of them on his back, that he may put on a new pair when the old is worn out. They cost but a cent and a half a pair. They are rights and lefts, and leave the foot free to the air. They are never worn in the house, being left outside the door; passing down a Japanese street long rows of them are seen at the doors, old and new, large and small. It is surprising to see how rapidly the Japs step out of them, and pick them up again with their feet without stopping when leaving the house.

AS THE most valuable wealth a country can possess is its healthy population, the tables of mortality are worth study; and from these we find that on the first day of life seventy-eight boys die, to sixty-three girls. In the first week of life 168 boys die, to 153 girls. In Prussia the mortality among females is the greatest from 10 to 13 years of age; and from the 25th to the 40th it is greater than at other periods of life, and yet at all periods of life the census of females compares favorably with that of males. In England, taking a period of seven years, there were eight men to fifteen women who were alive at 101 years; three men to five women at 102 years; two men to three women at 103 years of age, and no man to one woman who lived to 104. It is observed that only one person in 1,000 born lives beyond 94 years.

FROM a comparison of the results of recent deep-sea soundings, it appears that the following are just generalizations: 1. The water of the South Pacific is in its whole mass cooler than that of the Atlantic. 2. The water of the South Pacific is, down to 4,225 feet, somewhat warmer than that of the Atlantic, but below that depth cooler. 3. The bottom temperatures are generally lower in the Pacific than in the Atlantic at the same depths and in the same degree of latitude; but nowhere in the Pacific are found such low bottom temperatures as in the Antarctic portion of the South Atlantic, where temperatures of —0.3 centigrade to —0.6 degrees have been measured. 4. In the western parts of the Pacific and the adjoining parts of the East India archipelago, the temperature of the water reaches its minimum at depths between 1,787 and 8,937 feet, remaining the same from this depth to the bottom. In the whole of the Atlantic the temperature from 8,967 feet to the bottom gradually though slowly increases.

The Irish Highwayman.

An Irishman, finding his cash at low ebb, resolved to adopt "the road" as a professional means of refreshing the exchequer; and, having provided himself with a huge horse-pistol, proceeded forthwith to the conventional "lonely common" and lay in wait. The-no-less conventional "farmer returning from the market with a bag of money," of course, soon appeared, to whom enter Pat with the regulation highwayman offer of choice, "your money or your life!"—a remark fortified by the simultaneous exhibition of the fire-arm in the usual way. The farmer, who was a Quaker, essayed to temporize. "I would not have thee stain thy soul with sin, friend; and didst thou rob me of my gold, it would be theft; and didst thou kill me, it would be murder. But hold! A bargain is no sin, but a commerce between two honest men. I will give thee this bag of gold for the pistol which thou holdest at my ear." The unsuspecting amateur Macbeth, yielding, perhaps, to the Quaker's logic and solicitude for his spiritual welfare, made the exchange without a moment's hesitation. "Now, friend," cried the wily Ephraim, leveling the weapon, "give me back my gold, or I'll blow thy brains out!" "Blaze away, thin, darlint!" said Pat. "Sure there's niver a dhrop of powther in it!"—The result was a sold Quaker.—Chambers' Journal.

The Omnibus.

The long coach called an omnibus, with the entrance behind and the seats along the side, facing each other, originated in Paris in 1827, and in 1831 it began to come into use in London. In large cities it is found the most economical form of carriage, except those running on rails, for conveying the largest number of passengers through the streets. In Paris the public omnibuses are numerous and commodious, though their progress is slow as compared with those of London. One company has a municipal monopoly and owns all the lines. The omnibuses on the several lines are of different colors, and the lines are lettered from A to Z and from A B to A Z. In 1875 there were in London about 1,500 omnibuses, employing nearly 7,000 persons. The number was formerly much larger in proportion, for, in 1844, one company employed 1,400 omnibuses. But a large part of the city and suburban travel is now carried on tramways and underground railways. In New York city one was made in 1830 and run upon Broadway. In 1858 the number of these coaches employed upon various lines was 429. This was a considerable reduction from the number of former years, owing to the construction of horse railroads, and by 1873 the number was reduced to about 200.

How to Live in Summer.

Food is a part of drink, and drink a part of food; both sustain the constant changes of the body, and are necessary for its maintenance. Man may have early come upon the idea to manufacture beverages from various vegetable substances, and so have originated the habit of taking fluids, which are never really meant to quench thirst only. Some are taken for their aroma, for their supposed strengthening and stimulating qualities, as various wines and spirits; others, as beer, for their sustaining and satisfying properties; others, as some fruit and vegetable juices, for their refreshing qualities.

We call the three former, that is, spirits, wines and beer, alcoholic drinks; their composition we cannot here enter upon, but their effect upon the human system, if taken in any undue quantity, is not healthful. As regards the hot season, alcoholic beverages require the greatest care in their use, and to take only such wines as are really of a cooling tendency. When vitality flags very much it is possible to give a sudden stimulus to the nervous system by taking a small quantity of wine or spirits with cold water, which will rally an exhausted person suddenly and help him to exert his energies for recovery, but to drink successively any quantity of wines or spirits in hot weather is equal to trying to commit suicide on the chance—that the pistol will not shoot or the rope will not hang. To increase in summer the heat of the blood, which alcohol does, is an irrational venture.

As far as beer is concerned, the taking of it is by many thought a necessity, with the thermometer at 90 degrees. More beer and more beer is called for, while each glass makes the day hotter for him who takes. Beer should only be taken in the cool of the evening, and it may somewhat restore the flagging strength after the labor of the day. It is better to avoid it as much as possible during the day. We have now many aerated drinks, fruit and lime juices, mineral waters and iced lemonades, all refreshing and abating the influence of excessive heat from without.

Whatever these may do to cool us, they cannot do away with the results of dry, parched-up food, which occasions thirst in an undue degree.

To keep drink down, in fact, we must keep food up to its proper standard.

A very cooling drink is made of light clarets, with slices of pineapple, the peels of cucumber, a lemon slice or two, a little nutmeg and white sugar; this is not at every one's door, but such mixtures can be and are made with cheaper materials, and at the corners of our streets a good trade is done with them.

Rice water, barley water, oatmeal water, with lemon and sugar, should be ready in every house where children are. These are surely better than cold tea, which is often given, or milk, that cannot always be trusted.

Small pieces of ice are very refreshing now and then for strong, healthy persons; also, a drink of water mixed with vinegar and molasses is thirst-quenching for workpeople, or a slice of lemon dipped into white sugar. Cool the blood without disturbing the digestion and distending the intestines and you will get through the day.

A small ice-cream now and then is refreshing, but a continual use of it in sultry weather may have very evil consequences.

The humane custom to erect here and there a drinking fountain is in the highest degree praiseworthy; it will save many a headache, many a faltering spirit from giving way and cool many a parched tongue. But the water in such fountains must not be of an indescribable taste and a tepid temperature. Bright and clear it should sparkle, refreshing truly. This is a matter of grave thought to those in authority, who can escape from the heat of towns to the seaside and to sylvan shades, leaving the hard worker in the dusty, hot, smelling city.

The principal needs of life, until now spoken of, have been food and drink, though the first place ought to have been claimed by air.—Food and Health.

The Public Schools.

It would seem that the worst enemies of our common schools, as a general thing, are the trustees, superintendents and teachers.

Trustees are chosen, usually, because of their lack of education, their ignorance of the wants of parents and guardians, their utter inability to conduct the schools according to the idea and intention of the law, and their reckless disregard of common sense and the public good.

Superintendents, who should be cutting wood or pounding iron, are too often foisted upon the public, and entirely too often they conduct themselves in a manner disgraceful to the positions they hold and are a dead weight to the public-school system. In other words, and to make it short, there are entirely too many jackasses holding positions as superintendents who cannot write a grammatical sentence or prepare an article fit for publication in a respectable journal. Their sole idea seems to be to cram the pupil with a lot of silly stuff that is worse than no teaching.

In this city our public schools are well-nigh ruined by this policy and practice. In fact, our trustees this year were so heartily ashamed of the "progress" made in the public schools that for a long time they hesitated at holding "commencement" in public.

The only plan to save the public schools is to kick out all incompetents and appoint none but competent, faithful and sensible superintendents and teachers.—New Albany Public Press.

In Three Hundred Years.

An English author named Willis D. Hay has given to the world a very remarkable book, entitled "Three Hundred Years Hence." Hay's work indicates his possession of a wonderful imagination. He has endeavored to tell something of the world and its population in 2181, and his attempt bristles with startling ideas and wonderful theories. He describes the rise of Socialism and predicts that the Land League agitation will involve Great Britain in a civil war, which will destroy her commerce and pave the way for her downfall. Upon the ruins of crumbling empires will be founded a world-wide republic. A Yankee will invent an annihilating machine which will make wars impossible. The disappearance of armies and forts will make the universal republic stronger. The new force is discovered. By means of this, man walks on the floor of the ocean and forces his way through the bowels of the earth. Great caverns are discovered at enormous depths, and as the surface of the earth becomes crowded colonies are planted in these, and mighty domes shaped like diving bells, built upon the bed of the ocean and running up above the level of the water, afford temporary and permanent abodes to thousands. They cultivate sea weeds, and vegetables, and fibrous submarine plants for textile fabrics and dyes. Later the internal fires of the globe are made available for heating purposes. With their aid the frozen regions around the poles are rendered tropical. The vine and banana flourish there, and the long arctic night is made brilliant with electric lights. In time the population of the globe becomes so dense that the Ecumenical Council, the head-center of Government for the States of Humanity, decides that the four or five millions of acres covered by the habitations of men must be brought under cultivation. The population of the globe betakes itself to cities built upon piles in the seas, houses are demolished, and every inch of the earth's surface is cultivated for food. The Capitol wherein laws are made for the world is located at Terrapolis, a city of 10,000,000 inhabitants, built in the South Pacific Sea. It is ornamented with a few of the most remarkable buildings in the ancient world, including the Cathedral of Cologne, the Tower of London, the Vatican, and the great Pyramid.

A book of this character ought to make fascinating reading. How much of truth there may be in it the reader alone can determine. The predictions which Hay makes are founded upon scientific data. It is a pity that we can't live to see the wonderful changes he has in his mind's eye.

[From the Port Huron Commercial.]

Charles Nelson, Esq., proprietor Nelson House, speaking to us recently, observed: I suffered so much with Rheumatism that my arm withered, and physicians could not help me. I was in despair of my life, when some one advised me to try St. Jacobs Oil. I did so, and, as if by magic, I was instantly relieved, and, by the continued use of the Oil, entirely cured. I thank Heaven for having used this wonderful remedy, for it saved my life. It also cured my wife.

A Village of Terrors.

A Detroiter who had business in a village in Washtenaw County drove out there in a buggy, and of course went to the inn for his dinner. The landlord made no inquiries until after the meal was eaten and paid for and he then found opportunity to inquire:

"Were you going out to 'Squire Brown's place?"

"No."

"I didn't know but you were a lightning-rod man, and I was going to say that the 'Squire has threatened to shoot the next one on sight. We don't go much on them fellers around here, and I'm glad you are somebody else. Maybe you are going over to Judge Hardy's to sell him some fruit trees for fall setting?"

"No."

"Well, that's lucky. Only yesterday the Judge was remarking to me that the next fruit tree agent who entered his gate would want a coffin. Fact is, I myself have got to do some kicking to pay for being swindled on grape vines. You are not a patent-right man, eh?"

"No."

"Well, that's a narrow escape for you. We've been swindled here on hay forks, cultivators, gates, pumps, churns, and a dozen other things, and I'm keeping sixteen dozen bad eggs for use when the next patent-righter shows his face in this town. Perhaps you are a lecturer?"

"No."

"Well, you haven't lost anything. We never turn out very strong here to a lecture. The last man who struck us lectured on 'Our Currency,' but didn't take in enough of it to pay me for his supper. You are not a book-canvasser?"

"No."

"That's another escape. We've been laid out here so often that if an agent should offer to sell a $20 dollar Bible for fifty cents, we'd suspect a trick to beat us. Strikes me now that you may be a lawyer?"

"No."

"Good 'nuff. Last one who settled here had to leave town at midnight, and we don't want any more. Say, what are you, anyway?"

"A politician," replied the Detroiter.

"A politician! Then git! For heaven's sake don't stand around here if you value your life! We've just impeached our pound-master for embezzling the public money, and the excitement is so intense that the Democrats will ride you on a rail or the Republicans duck you in the water-trough. Git right up and scoot!"—Free Press.

European Breweries.

There are in Europe about 40,000 breweries, which produce annually nearly 2,250,000,000 gallons of malt liquor. Great Britian alone produces a third of the entire quantity, or, to be exact, 785,017,002 gallons. Prussia comes next with 318,579,998 gallons; Bavaria, 260,757,002 gallons; Austria, 245,975,158 gallons; and France, 155,980,000 gallons. It will thus be seen that the Teutonic nations are eminently the beer producers, as they are also the principal beer drinkers; where wine is to be had nearly as cheaply as beer the malt liquor is not preferred. The proportion in which beer is consumed varies very much. Bavaria heads the list with 54 gallons per head per annum, or rather over one gallon a week. Belgium is next with 30 gallons, and England is about the same, namely, 29 gallons, or, roundly speaking, something over half a gallon per head per week. In Germany excluding Bavaria, the average consumption is 19 gallons, and from this a great drop follows, to 9 gallons in Scotland, and 8½ in Ireland, whisky being preferred. Austria consumes only 6 gallons of beer per head, and France only 4.

[From the Fort Wayne (Ind.) Sentinel.]

When about twelve years old, said Mr. Geisman, of the Globe Chop House, to our representative, I met with an accident with a horse, by which my skull was fractured, and ever since I have suffered with the most excruciating rheumatic pains. Of late, I applied St. Jacobs Oil, which has given me almost total relief.

The Levees of the Mississippi.

In Louisiana the levee system is of comparative antiquity, having had its beginning in the earlier years of the eighteenth century, and the embankments long ago came under the jurisdiction of local and State Government and assumed the dignity of public works. In Mississippi and Arkansas, however, the reclamation of the swamp was an enterprise of much more moderate date, having its origin almost within memory of persons now living, and at first—and, indeed, for a long time—it was exploited solely by individual effort.

The earlier settlements on the river between Memphis and Vicksburg—generally wood-yards with small appurtenant corn-fields—were made upon unusually-high spots, which, although really formed by antecedent inundation, obtained, absurdly enough, the reputation of being "above overflow," because, for a number of years, they had not been actually submerged. They were prized accordingly, and the corn-fields of the wood-choppers were gradually transformed into cotton plantations, at first, of course, of very limited dimensions. Similar elevated spots were sought out and subjected to culture, and, before any leveeing operations had been attempted, the river bank on both sides was dotted with settlements of pioneer planters, who sought to utilize the fertile soil by cultivation. A very few years, however, sufficed to demonstrate the fallacy of the "above-overflow" pretension; the planter's mind relinquished the delusion that land should be high—it was sufficient that it should be dry—and the proprietors deemed it expedient to fortify against their common enemy. The water-marks left by the flood upon trees, stumps and fences were as plain as paint; these indicated the level of the water and supplied the want of engineering science. A make-shift levee of primitive style was constructed, very near the river bank, because less land was thereby thrown out, and because the ground is always highest upon the margin of the river, sloping thence inland. As the plantations increased in number and approximated each other, the principle of co-operation appeared; levees were built across unoccupied lands until there were disconnected strings ten, twelve or fifteen miles long. The construction of these was far from satisfactory. The operatives were generally the plantation negroes. At that time the Irish ditchers and levee-builders had scarcely made their appearance in the country. The colored people are not usually distinguished for their skill in the use of the spade, and cannot at all compete with the Hibernian. Some years there was high water, carrying dismay to the planter's heart; some years there was low water, inspiring confidence and security; occasionally there was no "water" at all—the river did not get out of its banks, and was, therefore, held in contempt. In 1844, however, the Mississippi, having apparently lost all patience with this persistent intrusion upon its domains, "spread itself," to use a vulgarism singularly descriptive of the operation, and treated its unbidden guests to a first-class "big overflow," the like of which had not been seen since 1828. The river rose early and went down late; it overflowed the whole country, and filled up the entire swamp; ruined all the levees, great and small; remained at or near high-water mark week after week and month after month until late in July, and did not finally retire within its banks until nearly the middle of August.—William L. Murfree, Sr., in Scribner.

Cigar Stumps in Paris.

The market for cigar stumps, which I looked in upon in the Place Maubert yesterday, is a veritable Parisian curiosity. The place is full of life and activity from 8 until 11 o'clock in the forenoon. A kilogram of stumps is worth 1 franc 50 centimes to 2 fr. 50 c., according to the length of the stump. Cheaper cigar stumps bring lower prices. There are four or five wholesale dealers in cigar stumps who have their headquarters in the wine saloons in the vicinity of the market, and these deal with the old men and women, and ragged little boys and girls, who go about the streets picking up these stumps. Much of the tobacco thus scraped together is sold to exporters, who make it up in fine cigarettes. There was once an old fellow who bought cigar stumps for a living, who died worth 15,000 francs a year. These pickers-up of ends and half smoked cigarettes are quite a nuisance to those people who frequent the boulevard cafes. They are forever getting in one's way, burrowing about one's legs, hunting for the coveted stump. From the heights of the Rue Mouffetard and the Rue Montmartre swarms of these lazaroni swoop down upon Paris and make us miserable with their intolerable presence.—Paris Letter.

What Cyrus Field Saw in Asia.

"There is no unusual discomfort about railway travel in India. Railway management there is of a high order, and, as to expense of operating, exceeds anything to be found in the United States. But about 33 per cent. of receipts of Indian railways are required to meet the expense of operation. What one of our railways can report as favorably as that?

"The Japanese are one of the cleanliest people on earth, personally. But as much cannot be said of them morally. It is the custom of the whole nation to bathe daily, but it may shock you to know that, until recently, men and women bathed together perfectly naked. The Government has established a law against promiscuous bathing, and the bathing houses are now made with a partition to separate the men and the women, but it is not very high. A few years ago it was a very common thing to see men and women stark naked taking a bath in front of their houses. The relation of the sexes in Japan are unfortunate, but no worse than elsewhere in Asia.

"The most refined Japanese are extremely courteous and agreeable people. We were invited to visit a Japanese merchant, with whom I was much pleased. Our reception was as curious as it was cordial. We had to remove our shoes at the door, and enter and make our visit in our stocking feet. Our host introduced us to three of his wives. I do not know how many more he had. It will give you some idea of the elegance of our entertainment if I tell you the tea we drank was made before us in a golden teakettle.

"The hills, mountains and volcanoes of Japan are exceedingly beautiful. The groves which occupy so much space in Japanese cities are very attractive. The inland sea upon which we crossed to Nagasaki is as beautiful as any water I ever sailed upon.

"Shanghai and Hong Kong are not filthy, and Saigon, in Cochin China, is cleaner than New York has been in many years. But the people do not bathe as frequently as in Japan, and the people are not as clean. The Celestials are sinewy, and have great endurance, but they would doubtless look less sallow and their physical condition would improve if they were not restricted to such monotonous diet. Rice is wholesome food, but they live almost exclusively upon rice, and the poorer class have hardly enough of that.

"The dwellings of the natives are poor everywhere in Asia. The only fine private buildings are the houses of foreign residents. The pagodas of the great cities of China are conspicuous above the hut-like houses of the people, but they are much inferior to the mosques and temples of India. As we sailed from the ports of China the pagodas were the last objects of sight, and, as we approached Singapore, the southernmost point of Asia, and passed through the Straits of Malacca to Penang, the temples of heathen deities were the first objects to attract our attention. So it was at every Asiatic port we entered. As we sailed up the Bay of Bengal to Rangoon, the capital of British Burmah, twenty-five miles within the mouth of the Irrawaddy, the greatest pagoda in the world raised its great golden dome imposingly before us."

Woman's Wisdom.

"She insists that it is more important that her family should be kept in full health than that she should have all the fashionable dresses and styles of the times. She therefore sees to it that each member of her family is supplied with enough Hop Bitters, at the first appearance of any symptoms of ill health, to prevent a fit of sickness with its attendant expense, care and anxiety." All women should exercise their wisdom in this way.—New Haven Palladium.

A Welsh Opinion of Royality.

It is, we think, to be regretted that the Prince of Wales has declined to allow his name to be used in connection with the National Eisteddfod of Wales. The loyalty of the Welsh people is beyond question, but when they ask a little favor it ought, if possible, to be granted. As there must have been reasons why his Royal Highness declined to have anything to do with the Eisteddfod it seems a pity they were not stated. We make these remarks because the refusal of the Prince to patronize the Eisteddfod has not only created a sore feeling in the Principality, but it has also exposed him to vulgar abuse, and has given the enemies of the Monarchy the opportunity of attacking not merely the Prince himself, but also the Queen and the Royal family.

Thus, a contributor to a Welsh newspaper elegantly declares that the incident has 'shortened Royality's life in this country fifty years."

"Already," he continues "the Welsh press have been heard to grumble, not only loudly but angrily, at this ungracious conduct of him who some day hopes to be called His Most Gracious Majesty. In the columns of an English daily last week appeared an article which, though not (because of the old absurd veneration for Royalty so long prevailing) so outspoken as it might have been, may yet be considered the first mutterings of a storm which will one day burst as surely as it is now brewing. Men, who, if you had spoken to them sneeringly or slightingly of the principle of Royalty a few months back, would have turned away from you in disgust, are now beginning to see through the mists of prejudice, and to question the use of the thing. When not only the utter uselessness, but the positive evil, of that which they have to pay so dearly for shall become apparent, then will it and other fooleries and sins be sent packing. As a beginning in the right direction, allow me to suggest the dropping from all toasts lists of the insane custom of drinking the healths of the Queen, the Prince of Wales and the rest of the Royal family. Welshmen have (although not for the first time) received proof positive that none of them are of any use to Wales. Even the musical and literary members of that family—the fiddling Duke of Edinburgh and the studious little Leopold, whom the irreverent believe to be in training for the Arbishopric of Canterbury—have thought themselves above patronizing Welshmen of like pursuits with themselves.—London Figaro.

"As for me, I do not believe what I do not understand." "Do you understand how it is that fire will soften butter but will harden an egg?" "No." "Yet you believe in an omelet!"

DR. PHILLIP C. BALLOU, OF VERMONT.

[From the Boston Daily Journal, June 7.]

We published several letters lately, which have evoked considerable comment, both from being read in our columns and in our contemporaries who have copied them. We refer to letters from Burlington, Providence, Springfield and Hartford, on the subject of the wonderful curative powers of a remedy called Kidney-Wort, which has been so thoroughly tried as to seem to be the long-looked-for medicine. Great good is done by a really first-class article, as this seems to be, and when it is recognised by regular physicians in all parts of the country it is naturally received by the people at large with faith. We append a letter on this subject received by us from a well-known "regular" physician from Northern Vermont. It is worth a careful reading:

Monkton, Vt., June 1, 1881.

Editors Boston Journal:

I have always been opposed to the use of patent medicines, as I am of the opinion that more harm than good is done by their indiscriminate use. Seeing that several correspondents have been singing the praises of Kidney-Wort, and knowing of some remarkable cures performed by it, I feel it but just that the public should know of them. I was induced to use it in my practice by positive evidence of its virtues, and have done so to a considerable extent for the past two years.

One of the first cures was that of Mrs. A——, who had suffered for years from an obstinate kidney trouble, complicated with constipation and uterine difficulty. There was an inflammatory condition of the organs which caused much pain and often severe suffering.

I had prescribed previously all the remedies usually employed in such cases, but without benefit. I procured Kidney-Wort for her, and directed it to be prepared and taken according to directions. It relieved the pain and suffering almost immediately, and gave a favorable turn to all the symptoms.

Her recovery progressed rapidly, and in a comparatively short time I was enabled to pronounce her cured. She has ever since been much stronger and healthier than for years before. I could detail a score or more of other cases in which I have used it with the same marked results, if I had time and space.

In the various kidney troubles it has been a very efficient remedy, far more decided in its effects than Buchu, Uva, Urie, Spirits Nitre and the other agents usually employed.

Its diuretic properties show themselves in two to four hours; while as a laxative and cathartic it produces the happiest results, relieving the bowels speedily and without disagreeable effects. Its action is prompt and the effect lasting. Being curative and tonic, it restores a condition of health and regular action which other cathartics usually fail to do.

This spring I found that through a close attention to my professional duties I had become worn, and was in need of a diuretic and cathartic myself. I at once took a few doses of Kidney-Wort, and found it operate equally well in my own case.

Very sincerely yours,
Phillip C. Ballou, M. D.

TAKE BACK THY GIFTS.

Take back thy gifts—I crave not one
To keep for memory's sake;
I would not have the sight of them
One fond regret awake.

A withered rose—ah! once so fair,
Faded and worthless now;
Fit emblem of our sweet, dead past,
And every broken vow.

One tiny curl, from off thy brow,
Held with a knot of blue;
"Be this a token," then you said,
"My love for thee is true."

Take back thy ring—a lovely pearl
Of rarest purity;
"An emblem of our love," you said,
"Through all eternity!"

I cannot say, take back thy love,
I'm sure 'twas never mine.
Would not a heart that's truly given,
More constant prove than thine?

And thus we part—I will not say
It causes me no pain;
A brightness from my life has gone
That ne'er will come again.

A Paradise for Householders.

Utopia, from the rate payer's point of view, has at length been discovered. It is a small town, situated in the very heart of the rich and fruitful Rhenish Palatinate, and its brief, unromantic name is Schopp. Recently the municipality of this ideal burg, finding its receipts largely in excess of its expenditures, resolved to dispose of the cash balance at its command by presenting to every householder within the civic precincts the handy little sum of £2 10s. A similar reparation of surplus income took place a few years ago, upon which still more propitious occasion each rate paying citizen received a bonus of £4 from the town exchequer. Our German contemporaries, the Frankfurter and Kölnische Zeitungen, in recording the above-mentioned facts, with justifiable pride and exultation point out that the solution of life's most difficult problem—how to eat your cake and have it too—has obviously been attained in Schopp. That is the place, they observe, in which the heart that is humble may hope to achieve perfect contentment. The Cologne Gazette concludes its reference to this fiscal paradise, "the happiest spot upon our earth," with an exhortation to its readers, couched in terms as stirring as they are terse. It runs as follows: "Up and away to Schopp." This irrepressible cri du cœur will doubtless find an echo in many a breast throughout the length and breadth of the fatherland.—London Telegraph.

A London Daily News correspondent, writing from Nelson, New Zealand, says: "Whoever in England, whether farmer, tradesman, artisan or laborer can by an honest and honorable means manage to keep a roof over his head, let him by all means stop where he is. The safest speculator in this direction is undoubtedly the British farmer with a moderate capital, but even him, in view of the low prices of produce here, I would advise to wait till we see the effect of the better times which have already begun."

THE Apache Indians are on the war-path as usual, and killing and torturing every one they can reach. It is feared that a general war with the savages on our southwestern border is about to begin. It promises to be an unusually troublesome matter, as the Indians can so easily escape by crossing the boundary into Mexico.

EVERY ONE who has seen coal mines will remember the vast amount of coal dust lying useless in front of the mines. A man in Philadelphia has invented a plan by which this dust is made into lumps so that it can be burned in ordinary stoves, and the nuisance to miners, will become a valuable product.

The South Bend Register is authority for the statement that Clear Lake at Laporte is lined with dead fish that have floated to the banks within the last few days. It is thought by some that the fish are poisoned by the woolen mills on the bank of the lake. The marshal has had a force of men at work burying the fish to prevent sickness in the town.

Here is what the Edgerton Herald says of their barber, brother to Sam and Charley Pommert, of this place. But our citizens need not be alarmed about these fellows cutting down prices, no, it "don't pay now:" We are pleased to hear that our tonsorial friend Joe Pommert will reduce his price for hair cutting on Monday next and will thereafter cut hair for 15 cents.

The Valparaiso Messenger says: Mr. Nathaniel Petit is the owner of a historical horse known as the "Divorce Horse," it having carried two women to as many successful divorce suits. It is now the proposition of interested parties that the services of this successful divorce horse be tendered to a certain woman who is about to instigate proceedings for a divorce.

THE condition of the president has been unsatisfactory for several days past. Tuesday he was very weak, with fever, and frequent vomitings. The attending physicians began to consider his condition as quite critical. But yesterday the symptoms were all better, and hopes are now entertained that the crisis is over, and that he may yet recover.

The Valparaiso Messenger has a page devoted to the commencement exercises of the Normal school. Among other things we notice the following in regard to F. K. Blake of this county. "At the Alumni banquet on Monday evening, August 8, the toast, "The Storied Past of the Normal" was ably responded to by F. K. Blake: He spoke of the work done by the Normal during the past seven years with enthusiasm and glowingly referred to the work yet to be done as a great one.

DR. BLISS, one of the president's attending physicians, having been mentioned lately in connection with the Condurango cancer cure swindle, Schuyler Colfax writes to the Inter-Ocean, exonerating the doctor from all blame in the matter. Mr. Colfax says that the medicine was at first very effective in the case of his mother who was treated with it, and that this fact was advertised all over the country. But when a new lot of it was sent for, it proved useless. Nobody has ever been able to assign a reason for the failure of the second lot.

A DECISION was recently made by the treasury department, that United States' marshals can collect mileage but once for each actual trip made to subpœna witnesses, although several witnesses may be called upon. It has heretofore been the custom to charge full mileage for each process served, although the witnesses all lived in the same town, and but one trip was made for all. But it seems that this sensible decision applies only to charges against the government, private individuals being still subject to the old charges.

Our readers will be pained to learn that M. F. Collier, agent of the N. Y. Dr. Teal is attending him.—[Kendallville Standard.

A rather novel occurrence took place at the establishment of W. Featherston, dealer in butter and eggs at 207 West Washington street, this city. This was the voluntary hatching of a chicken from one of many dozen eggs packed in the store. The heat of the room happened to have been kept for several weeks past at the right temperature for incubation and hence this unusual freak of nature. The little chicken would probably have been reared to maturity as a natural curiosity but for the untimely death it met at the hands, or rather claws, of a voracious grimalkin.—[Cincinnati Enquirer.

Last Saturday night as Mr. M. R. Hull was about leaving his hardware store he threw a black felt hat into a large, pressed-tin dish-pan which was in the show window. No one visited the store until Monday morning, when the hat was found to be partially burned, there being quite a quantity of ashes in the bottom of the pan. It is evident that a slight imperfection in the plate glass window concentrated the sun's rays the same as a burning glass. It is quite probable that many mysterious fires are caused in this manner, and it will be well for people to keep their windows shaded, especially when no one is in the building.—[Steuben Republican.

Among the experimental industries of Goshen is that of selling live spring chickens on the shell. Mr. Gebhardt bought a lot of eggs of one of our merchants, among which was one that looked peculiarly bed-ridden. On opening it somewhat carefully, not knowing but it might be a new dynamite explosive, a live chicken stuck out its head and asked to be relieved. Fortunately the little waif had fallen into humane hands, and on being extricated from its prison, was placed in the care of Miss Mary Gebhardt, who kindly consented to adopt the poor orphan. Little "Peep" is now as lively as a cricket, and is becoming the pet of the household. If the merchant of whom the egg was purchased is experimenting with some patent incubator, the first fruit may be considered a success.—[Goshen Times.

The picnic of the Reform churches at the Lake Saturday was a very nice one in spite of the threatened bad weather. Many went up with teams, but all returned in good season.

Miss Eva Lacey, daughter of Rev. H. J. Lacey, is home for vacation. She has been attending at Mt. Holyoke Seminary, Mass. His son, O. M. Lacey, of Indianapolis, was here visiting his parents last week.

J. J. Martin and family, of Auburn Junction, spent Sunday visiting in the family of J. A. Barns. Jay eats watermelon according to directions in this week's Courier, and digests it on general principles.

R. Wes. McBride has been adding to his already large collection of stuffed animals, a white red-squirrel, and no mistake. It is a regular albino, including the red eyes, and is a real curiosity. It will pay to go and see it.

A little daughter of Simon Zerkle, who now resides in Toledo, was buried here Tuesday. It was just one year old, the day it was buried. It had been sick several weeks. The bereaved parents have the sympathy of the entire community.

An unfortunate young mink tried to cross the street Sunday to get from one sidewalk to the other. He hadn't read the papers, or he would know that our streets are crowded on Sundays. His ignorance cost him his life. Papa Mink and Mamma Mink are in deep mourning because their loved one is now a leading star in Mr. McBride's zoological collection.

The Jackson road commenced grading for their new side track last Saturday, and will push it forward as fast as possible. It will be on the west side of the main line and extend from the Lake Shore crossing to a point south of the freight house. It is hoped that this will facilitate the moving of freight cars, so as to make less delay in trains passing here.

The junior base ball club played a game with the Angola juniors Saturday. All agree that the game was a well played one, and was extremely close. When the Waterloo boys went to bat the last time, the sides were even, but owing to endurance and pluck of some of our boys, they won the game, the score standing 15 to 12 in favor of Waterloo.

F. K. Blake returned from Valparaiso last Saturday. He graduated there in the scientific course, and after remaining at home two or three weeks, will go to Bloomington, Ill. to assist in building up a normal school there. This institution will be known as the Northern Illinois Normal School, and Mr. Blake is to be professor of mathematics and the natural sciences. We learn that the school is meeting with great encouragement from the people of Bloomington. A fund of $35,000 is guaranteed the school as soon as its enrollment reaches 150. We congratulate friend Blake on his future prospects.

No Game.

THE NEWVILLE BOYS FAIL TO COME TO TIME.

Last Saturday our boys made every arrangement for the Newville nine to have a pleasant time and a good game, but they did'nt put in an appearance. Cane-seated rocking chairs were arranged upon a handsomely decorated platform, overlooking the field where valor, beauty and manhood were expected to be seen, contending in a game for victory. The procession from Jackson township was five miles long, and they brought $10,000 with them to wager on Os. Allen's nine. The Auburn Cornet Band was engaged to escort the players to the field, followed by the procession from Jackson and our citizens in general. Drays were engaged to take down several cases of Lung Balsam to prevent hoarseness, in case of too much cheering. Os. furnished his nine with twenty-five buckets of "fish-bait oil" and they greased themselves thoroughly and put a new set of tacks in their shoes. Chris. Baldock hired a little boy to pitch pebble stones until nearly noon so that he could practice batting, and when he learned that the Newville nine were not coming, he paid the little fellow off with an advertising cent. The Newville boys can congratulate themselves for not coming over, as they would have got terribly scooped —to hear our fellows tell it.

"Of all sad words of tongue or pen,
The saddest are these—'It might have been.'"

Be Satisfied.

THINGS GENERALLY TURN OUT WELL FOR THE FARMER.

Many farmers complain of hard times and short crops long before the harvest time. They never seem to realize that when one crop fails that some other one is bountiful. For instance at the present time, it is true that the farmer has sufficient reason to complain of his crops this year, especially the wheat crop, and at the same time he has reason to rejoice over the extremely good prices he can command for five stock of all kinds. Hogs and cattle in particular, have not maintained such a uniform price for a long time as they do now, and the present outlook indicates that prices will rise. There seems to be a compensation somewhere for every loss. We have talked with some farmers who say that their business does not pay them, while at the same time it is a noticeable fact that they are erecting new buildings each year, tearing down the old frame house and building brick dwellings; yet some declare that farming don't pay, with the above facts staring them in the face. Be satisfied.

Bad Habits.

PEOPLE WHO ATTEND TOO MUCH TO THEIR NEIGBORS' AFFAIRS.

We have had occasion lately to listen to several parties in town who speak very unbecomingly of their neighbors, and from our own observation we are convinced that their remarks are absolutely without foundation. Our advice to this class of people is, that if they can't say any good of their neighbor they should not criticise, especially behind their backs. Perhaps while you are pecking and dilating on the faults and short comings of others, some of even greater magnitude about yourself may be staring them in the face. Next to this class come those who stoop to wilfully and maliciously lying about their neighbors, sometimes just to while away the time, or to have a little talk stirred up, or for the sake of gratifying a personal spite. Such people are contemptible in the extreme.

About Snakes.

RELIABLE BUT NOT VERY WONDERFUL.

We always dislike to start out on a snake story, as they have become so numerous and been exaggerated so greatly, that whenever a subscriber meets you, after publishing one, he alwas gets his eyes in a bias position when he passes us. Never comes up squarely, hands out his paw and says, "That snake story was immense—every word of it true." This one comes from Surveyor Foltz, and here it is: While he was crossing a wheat field recently, he came across a nest of young milk snakes, and with his little hatchet he chopped them into eternity in less time than it takes us to tell it. He says there were one hundred and twenty-five, but we think he means the pieces—making, when put together, about twenty little snakes. Next.

We had a Show.

PITCHED THEIR TENT ON FLUKE'S VACANT SPOT.

Monday and Tuesday a show company stopped here and exhibited some wonderful curiosities. The two-headed boy is surprising. The second head is at the lower end of the spine, and is supported by a pair of well developed shoulder-blades. It is about the size of a child's head at birth, not having grown with the rest of the body. Its occiput is covered with fine silken hair, and the face bears some resemblance to the face of the upper head. It is devoid of conciousness. The classical tragi-comedy of Punch and Judy is interesting to the greater part of the audience. The cage of trained canary birds is simply wonderful, obeying their master much better than many children do their parents.

—A. D. Moore, of Wilmington, showed us some fine wheat last Saturday. It was the best in quality that we have seen this year, and the yield is good. He threshed 252¼ bushels from ten acres of land. The land was originally a black oak swamp, but by careful cultivation and underdraining, it is one of the best fields on his farm. Mr. Moore is of the opining that wheat in his part of the county will average ten bushels to the acre, but the quality will not be as good as on his best field.

Soldiers' Re-Union.

THE BOYS IN BLUE MEET AT BUTLER TODAY.

"In 1861 this cruel war first begun." And to call back the recollections of numerous incidents which transpired during the service, the boys have met at our neighboring town to-day to tell them over to each other and have a good time in general. We anticipate a large crowd, and wish for them a happy pleasant meeting. These gatherings have been very successful in this county, drawing the largest crowds of any public calling. A large number of our citizens will attend to-morrow, and swell the crowd considerably for the boys in blue.

—Two buggies, like "Our Grandfather's Clock," stopped short upon the streets Saturday for the want of "iling." One fellow said he greased his that morning. This reminds us of the darkey whom his master told to give the buggy a thorough greasing, that he was going to make a long drive. The negro was at the barn for a good while, and when he returned he said: "Dar, massa, dat buggy am greased from top to bottom. I only missed one little place, an' dat am whar de wheels run on; yes, sah."

—The merchants are beginning to advertise, and they should bear in mind that the COURIER job rooms turn out the best work in the county, and always have it completed when promised. The paper is acknowledged everywhere to be up with the times, both in editorial and local matter, and, of course, this fact, together with its large circulation, makes the paper one of the best in the county for advertising purposes. We have interesting reading matter upon each page, so that the advertiser is benefited the same as our subscribers.

—There are a few men, living in the rural districts, who are in the habit of coming to town and while spending the day in drinking and making themselves disgusting in general, they leave their teams standing in the street without food or water the entire day. Summer's heat or winter's cold, makes no difference to the heartless wretches, and it is time the authorities took the matter in hand.

—We have some terrible bad sidewalks and crossings. It is almost imposible for ladies to wheel a cab over some of them. They have cracks large enough to let a tug boat through and some of them are positively dangerous. We have a number of first class sidewalks, too, but why not have them all good and substantial. Poor walks will condemn any town in the eyes of strangers.

—We call attention to the professional card of P. V. Hoffman, esq. on our first page. Mr. H. is a young man of good ability, and good attainments He has taken great pains to acquire a thorough knowledge of the law, and having had several years practice at the bar, should certainly receive, as he always has, a fair share of the legal patronage.

—Ladies if the flies annoy you too much, take half a teaspoonful of black peper in powder, one teaspoonful of brown sugar, and one full of cream. Mix them together and place it where the flies are troublesome and they will soon disappear. If this don't work, explode some powder in the room—a keg will do.

—H. C. Miller wore his soldier badge to the grove meeting Sunday, and when the congregation started to sing "We're going home," Miller struck up the song, "Marching through Georgia," thinking it was the gathering of a soldiers' re-union. Fred. April says that he don't know what H. C. could have been thinking about.

—A publication of the pension list would be mighty interesting. Among the pensioners in this place are apparently the most able-bodied of men, who have nothing the matter with them that is visible, yet they draw pensions with a refreshing regularity. Uncle Sam is bled profusely and unjustly.

—Isaac Roth turned his horses out to graze Sunday night, and they could not be found anywhere up to Tuesday night. It being so near time for county fairs, we surmise that some horse jockey has pulled them in, and will enter them for the 2:30 race at the Allen county fair.

—Tom Cool and "Col." Oiler had a political discussion below the COURIER office last Saturday. Tom wound up with, "a man who will change his politics every fifteen minutes ought to be used as a back-stop for a base-ball match," after which it clouded up and we had a light shower.

—The "Comet" is the latest brand of whiskey. Terrible tails are told of its rapidity of action.—Exchange. The whiskey here has com-et over the boys for some time—that brand is not new with us. And horrible tails have been told of its double action.

—It will be remembered that last winter Sherm. Hollister put several cases of oysters in his ice house. He took out four cases Tuesday and sent them over to Butler with Frank Benedict. The Butlerites will have a "picnic" if Frank don't devour 'em all on the way over there.

—We are sorry to learn that Mrs. T. H. Leasure, nee Miss Nettie Shaw, died at her home in Bucyrus, Ohio, week before last, of consumption. Nettie has many warm friends in this place who will feel sad to learn her untimely death.

—Some villainous boys are making a nuisance of themselves by defiling and destroying the school property in District No. 4, Concord township. The citizens of the district are very indignant and will make an example of these young scamps.

—The boys will have it that "Fatty" Umber beat the excursion train from Fort Wayne to Academie. It is not known exactly what time he started, but they all think in a very few seconds after the Dutch police said: "Look oudt, poys, I going to shood."

—George S. Smurr, one of the oldest settlers of Wilmington township, is lying quite low with chronic diarrhoea. Mr. S. is quite an old man, having passed his 87th year. He is now living with his son, Harvey Smurr, on the old homestead that he settled in 1842.

A Pleasant Party.

THE LITTLE FOLKS ENJOY AN EVENING AT ED. BAKER'S.

Last Friday evening, Miss Lila Baker, little daughter of Edward Baker of the Sixth street bakery, gave a party for the pleasure and amusement of her young associates. A large number were present, and they had a happy, joyful time all the afternoon. When evening came Mrs. Baker had a nice supper for them. Ice-cream and cake were also served, and this, together with their romping and game-playing, made it an occasion for all present to remember long into the future.

The Contract Let.

PARTIES IN AUBURN RECEIVED THE CONTRACT FOR BUILDING THE SCHOOL HOUSE.

Last Friday the contract for re-building the new school house was let to Shearer & Wilson, of this place, for six thousand one hundred eighty dollars. The building is to be on about the same plan that it was before the fire consumed it, with the exception of the north and south ends, which will be longer. There will be no white brick used this time. These parties are to finish the building with the exception of plastering, flooring and a few other specified points. However, it will not make the cost of the building more than about ten thousand dollars. We hope that the work will be pushed forward rapidly.

—Would'nt it be a good scheme for some of our young "school marms" to open up a select school while the new building is being erected? There are a number of families in town who do not like to have their children attend school in the building opposite the jail.

—The band boys seem to have lost a little of their usual energy and love for practice meetings. It is no easy matter to get them all together at an early hour. If the girls would do their shopping in the afternoons it would help things wonderfully.

—There is nothing that makes a man look so attractive as a nice suit of clothes made by a practical tailor. Henry Yesbera has a record for his superior qualities in cutting and fitting. He will have a new line of goods shortly.

—Now, as business begins to open up, the wide-a-wake manager of the Boot-upside-Down is taking advantage of the situation, and has sent out to the people of DeKalb 3,000 invitations for one and all to call in and examine his goods.

Carpenters and laboring men of all classes have no cause for grumbling. There is a strong demand for all kind of mechanics and laborers, at fair wages, yet, we are sorry to say, that our town has several permanent loafers.

—Things look a little as though the Wabash shops would be located here yet. Our citizens should continue to make an effort and we may have the good fortune to secure them. There is nothing gained without trying.

—J. Rummell, superintendent of the poor farm, is still in the market with an extra quality of green corn. He will continue to supply the citizens of this place for some time to come.

—One would think by reading Wemer's paper at Butler, that there was one of the biggest wars now going on that was ever known on the face of the globe—and Harry hasn't got a pension yet.

—John Brown, living east of town, was taken before "Bijah" and fined $10 and costs for running his horse down Main street. John is not the only one who drives too fast on our public thoroughfares.

—The stone street crossings are not a success. Even when a young couple, who are engaged, cross them they separate, and walk upon the outer edge, to avoid tramping over the stones in the center.

—The first nine and a "picked nine" played a match game of ball Monday. The f. n. came out victorious, and they all stretched their necks long, cast their eyes toward Newville, and said, in chorus: "Let hem! come."

—An economical correspondent consults us on the matter of making a little money go a good ways. According to our ideas the best way would be to put it into an envelope and send it to us.

—Real good, lively local matter is generally quiet this time of the year, and we would be obliged to our people if they would let us know of any interesting local items that come under their observation.

—The local editor on the Hot Springs Evening Star—Tom Mays' paper—can "bang more dictionary" into a four-line item than would be necessary for a page of the average daily papers.

—The Hicksville fair begins Sept. 20, 1881. They are making unusual efforts to have a good time. Correspondence solicited. Address, S. J. Moore, secretary.

—Sheriff Leas has added a live buffalo to his stock of legal assets. He took it on a claim against a man named Clink, near Garrett. Admission to the show is free, we believe.

—There were no services at the M. E. church Sunday morning—they all attended the grove meeting. In the evening the "grove meeting" attended the M. E. church.

—A letter from Jack Little states that he will not stay in Toledo, Ohio, very long. He thinks some of going to Detroit or Cleveland. Better come home to his ma.

—"Lightning never strikes in the same place."—Exchange. There is no necessity for its striking a second time. It generally finishes the business during the first shock.

—Jake Nye, the honest horse jockey of Sedan, is going to Hudson to open up a meat market in a few weeks. Farmers get your bovines in killing order.

—Walt. and Nick. Coe, two young "prints" who formerly stuck type on the DeKalb county Democrat, published at this place fifteen or eighteen years ago, were in town Monday. They are both good printers, having served their full apprenticeship under their father, Howard Coe. Unlike the boys of to-day, they are familiarly acquainted with the hardships of the printer's devil; putting in their full time at the roller crank, the wood-pile and the "dirty work," which in those days were placed entirely under the devil's control. But now they reap their reward, and are not obliged to labor upon the patent side of the Fort Wayne Gazette and other non-union papers for twenty cents per thousand. —Charley Emanuel is looking up a room, which looks a great deal as if he intended to open a law office in this place. The rumor was current that he was going to Spencerville.

Jno. Moore.

AT LAST THE WINE CUP HAS LED HIM TO COMMIT CRIME.

Our citizens are all well acquainted with "old Jno. Moore" and his past life for a number of years. Jno. is a man of some talent, being an incessant reader and a man of fair natural ability. For the last seven or eight years he has been a slave to strong drink and has gradually drifted along the downward path of life. We noticed him wandering from one saloon to the other several days ago, and it was plain to be seen that he was slowly wending his way "over the hill to the poor house." His family is scattered here and there, toiling to earn their own livelihood. His wife is making her home with her sister, a Mrs. Carson, living near Garrett, and last Friday Jno. went to Carson's house and not being received very gratefully became angry, and to give his inner fellings relief he set fire to two of Mr. Carson's wheat stacks, entirely destroying them. The officers are in search of him, and he will probably end his days in the state prison. Such is life.

The Grove Meeting.

A LARGE NUMBER OF PEOPLE IN ATTENDANCE.

The grove meeting held by the Lutheran denomination in Baker's grove last Sunday was very largely attended, people from all parts of the county coming and going all day long. It is hard to keep good order at an open gathering of this kind; however, this especial point was well managed. It looks bad for boys from fifteen years old and upward, smoking cigars and puffing the perfume of tobacco into the faces of ladies. Parents should accompany their children to places of this kind or keep them at home. The average youth of to-day should never be out of grabbing distance of his father, and especially so upon the sabbath day. We would like to see more of these meetings, as they have a tendancy to draw the wayward young man where he can hear the preaching of the gospel.

"Lynch 'Em."

A DARING MOB WHO TRIFLE WITH TOAD LATSON.

A few weeks ago, some fellows carried rubbish, threw potatoes, etc., on the grounds of the public square, and Toad had to waste a good deal of time in clearing them away. Last week the same crew unloaded two large stones upon the north pavement, which took Toad and five other equally muscled young men to elevate upon a wheelbarrow, and Jim McDowell had to be paid a good price for hauling them off. Toad says that he don't know any one who could have gotten them there, unless it would be Coop. Ralston. This week they purchased watermelons, and went into the square to devour them, throwing the peels promiscuously over the short, green grass. Toad has purchased a deringer No. 2 calibre, and the sheriff has ordered a new invoice of hand-cuffs, and these fellows will be dealt with in a rough and careless manner.

Hay is Scarce.

FARMERS HOLDING THEIR HAY IN ANTICIPATION OF A BETTER PRICE.

We hear a number of our town people complaining of the scarcity of hay. The farmer will not sell now, and desires to hold it until next winter, thinking that grass will again reach the price of $16 and $18 a ton. Last year the hay packers consumed all the surplus hay in the county, and owing to this fact the price paid was quite large. This season, we understand, the hay packers will not buy, having a supply yet on hand that was not disposed of. The price now ranges from $6 to $10 a ton, which is a fair price for this article, and we believe that the farmer will do as well to sell now, at this figure, as he can by keeping it until the middle or latter part of next winter.

—The September meeting of the township trustees will be held, in accordance with law, on the first day of September. The meeting will be in the COURIER office.

—C. Sheets is the owner of a colt that is the very image of Buck Allen's old Jock. The day it was three months and a half old it weighed 480 pounds, and was not fat.

—Nothing has been done at Butler toward building the Wabash shops. The gang of men now employed are working between here and the Junction. Looks a little sideways, eh.

—The Steuben Republican has a correspondent at this place. Miller will have to enlarge his paper to make room for his "wonder-phool" productions.

—On August 4th was the 66th birthday of Mrs. Catharine Shugars, on which occasion she called in her seven grand-children and made each a present of $20 in gold.

—A wire fence has been placed around the maple trees surrounding Eaton's building, thereby preventing teams from damaging the trees. A very sensible move.

—The Coe boys have been in town getting up business cards on postals. They claim a copyright, but we're a little too old to use that grade of "taffy."

—We noticed a big tear in Os. Allen's eye Saturday, which went far to inform us that the Newville nine had gone back on their contract.

—Frank Goodman, formerly of this place, and Miss Alice Elson, daughter of T. C. Elson, have joined hearts and hands in the matrimonial trade.

—The rain in the forenoon Saturday brought the farmers into town in the afternoon in "delegation order." Trade was good and our merchants jubilant.

—The trundle-bed ball nine had made preparations to have a match game at Waterloo Saturday, but the rain blighted their arrangements.

—A serenading party went down south Main street Saturday evening, burlesquing the beautiful song, "Down upon the Suwanee River."

—Olive Logan commenced one of her lectures recently with the remark, "Whenever I see a pretty girl I want to clasp her in my arms." So do we.

GENERAL.

IT is reported that instructions have been received from the Chinese Government modifying the original order for the return of the Chinese students in this country. Assistant Postmaster General Elmer says that $814,666 were saved to the Government during the month of July by the discontinuance of the star routes needlessly and no doubt fraudulently established. WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON dispatches represent President Garfield as progressing favorably toward recovery. He now partakes at regular intervals of goodly quantities of solid and liquid foods, and sleeps quietly without anodynes. His tongue has begun to assume its natural appearance, and there is considerable improvement in the process of digestion and assimilation. The discharge from the wound is in every respect satisfactory, and there is a very strong probability that the wound round the ball is healing. The hypodermic injections of morphine have been omitted by the physicians.

GEN. BOQUET, of Mexico, has been sent to Chihuahua to assume command of the troops in that district. He has orders to concentrate all available forces and march against the Indian marauders who have crossed the border....Francis Murphy the temperance orator, has sailed for Liverpool, to organize a reformation in Great Britain....Miss Clara Louise Kellogg, who has arrived at New York, states that the police of St. Petersburg opened her letters and cut her newspapers.

THE febrile condition of the President for several days having suggested to the surgeons that the cause was the detention of pus in the cavity of the wound, they took advantage, on the morning of the 8th, of the patient's improved condition to make another incision into the track of the bullet below the margin of the twelfth rib. This operation was successfully performed, the President having first been etherized. Although suffering some nausea from the anæsthetic, he soon regained his previous condition. The present incision, the physicians declare, can be left open and unobstructed as long as may be necessary, and the best results are confidently expected.

A WASHINGTON telegram says of Guiteau, the assassin: "He has now been confined in jail over five weeks. It is rather a singular fact that no one has ever called upon him at the jail with a friendly purpose, that during his wanderings in this city he never made one friend who now manifests any substantial interest in him; that no letter has been received by Guiteau proffering him counsel or assistance. Such an absolute destitution of friends is something unprecedented even in the case of the meanest criminals. He has never asked to have anybody sent for. Officials at the jail state that Guiteau is a very tractable prisoner. The representations frequently made that he is restless and querulous are not founded on fact. He is more composed now and less nervous than when first taken to jail. He has settled down, the officials say, to await philosophically for the result. At no time since his confinement, it is stated by his attendants, has he shown any manifestation of sorrow or remorse. He shows some anxiety about the President's condition and hopes that he will recover."

THE first official act of the President since the shooting was performed on the 10th inst. He affixed the signature "James A. Garfield" to a document which extradited a criminal wanted by the Canadian authorities for forgery. He signed his name firmly and suffered no evil effects from the unusual exertion.... FOREIGN.

THE Hon. Levi P. Morton, the new Minister from the United States to France, and Gen. Noyes, the retiring Minister, had an interview with President Grevy at Paris. Alluding to the friendship existing between the two nations for a century, they trusted it would become perpetual. Both nations had been foremost in maintaining a Government "of the people, for the people and by the people," and America was proud to be united with France in the maintenance of such a form of government.... The Emperors of Austria and Germany had a half-hour's consultation at Gastein on the 5th inst., after which Emperor William accompanied Francis Joseph to the railway station and bade him a hearty adieu on his departure for Munich....In the recently discovered conspiracy at St. Petersburg sixty persons, some of them of high rank, are implicated. The Golos, a rather free-speaking journal printed at St. Petersburg, is in trouble again. An electric railway, an electric boat and a Tissandier balloon attracted a great deal of attention.

REV. DR. H. W. THOMAS, the distinguished Methodist divine, is to be arraigned for heresy next month, at Chicago. The trial will excite widespread interest.... Late advices from New Mexico report great alarm in that Territory over atrocities perpetrated by renegade Indians. I., under the Presidency of George William Curtis, and adopted resolutions approving the Civil-Service Reform bill introduced into the United States Senate last session by Mr. Pendleton, of Ohio, calling on members of Congress and Senators to aid in making the bill law; favoring competitive examinations at various convenient points in the United States for those who might wish to be examined for positions in the civil service; declaring it necessary that the Civil-Service Reform League of New York should be aided in its work by local organizations, and declaring that the bill introduced in the House of Representatives last session by Mr. Willis, of Kentucky, provides practical and judicious measures for the remedy of the abuse known as political assessment, and urging uncompromising opposition to arbitrary removals from office, and the interference of members of Congress with the exercise of the appointing power.

THE Republicans of Virginia met in State Convention at Lynchburg. The "Straight-outs" were in a minority, but their leaders, Congressmen Dezendorf and Jorgensen, and the Chairman of the State Central Committee played a sharp trick on the Coalitionists, shut them out from the convention hall, and admitted only those who would act under their instructions. Those who were shut out organized a convention of their own. A committee of conference was then appointed. The conference committee failed to bring about peace. The Coalitionists, or Mahoneites indorsed the regular Readjuster platform and adjourned without making nominations. The "Straight-outs" nominated Gen. William C. Wickham for Governor, Samuel M. Yost, of Staunton, for Lieutenant Governor, and Judge Willoughby, of Alexandria, for Attorney General. All these gentlemen have declined, however, and it is probable that no other persons will be nominated in their places, in which case there will be a square, fair, stand-up fight between Readjusters and Democrats.

A WASHINGTON telegram of the 11th inst. says "To-day President Garfield wrote his first letter since the shooting. It was to his mother at Mentor, and assured her of his confidence in recovery. Two Egotists.

Judge R. and Journalist H. are troubled with the disease of egotism, and for the first time, in speaking of each other, brought to my knowledge the fact that the patient is not aware of his own infirmity.

"I like the Judge," said the journalist, "for he is a man of fine attainments; but I must cut him. He cannot get away from himself. His coat-tail is glued to his base."

"I wish," said the jurist, "that H. were less of an egotist. It is dreadful to hear him from morning till night, and all night, talk of himself. It is astonishing he does not see what a bore he makes himself."—Washington Capital.

A DARK MYSTERY.

The Strange Disappearance of Editor Walls, of Paris, Ill.

The mysterious disappearance in Chicago, on July 22, of Mr. C. N. Walls, the editor of the Paris (Ill.) Republican-Beacon, and which at the time excited much comment both from the press and the public, has finally come to be looked upon by the friends of the missing man as a case of murder for purposes of robbery. The police of Chicago have not ceased in their efforts to find a clew to Mr. Walls' whereabouts, but, so far, they have been eminently unsuccessful. The Chicago Inter Ocean, commenting editorially upon this dark mystery, says:

A body was found in the lake on Thursday which was thought at one time to be that of C. N. Walls, editor of the Paris (Ill.) Republican, whose disappearance two weeks ago was widely chronicled.

The circumstances connected with this disappearance are among the strangest on record, and rival in mystery the stories of Charles Reade or Wilkie Collins.

About ten days ago, while thousands of excited men and gayly-dressed women were cheering and waving their handkerchiefs over a closely-contested race at the Jockey Club Park, a gentleman in a prominent seat of the grand stand fell suddenly back in an unconscious condition. There was a bustle and stir in the dense crowd immediately surrounding him but the great mass knew nothing or paid little attention to one man in a simple fainting fit. The bell struck sharply, ordering up the dripping horses for another heat, and the unfortunate man, removed from the immediate presence of the crowd, was left to work his way back to consciousness, while the gay thousands again turned their attention to the races. Stranger though he was to those surrounding him, there would have been plenty of assistance rendered without doubt had there not appeared, in the bustle and excitement immediately following the fainting fit, two men, who seemed to be the stranger's friends, and who took charge of him. It is now known that these men were unacquainted with Mr. Walls, that they were without doubt villains of the worst type, and that under the guise of acquaintance they took the unconscious man away with them, robbed him, and probably ended the matter by murdering him. That such a thing should be possible in this day, and in this city, seems too horrible to believe, and yet this conviction is forced upon us. From the moment they disappeared all trace of these men and their victim was lost, and none has as yet been found, unless the silent, floating body found in the lake proves to be the missing man. It is understood that Mr. Walls had a considerable sum of money with him, and, if murder has been committed, it was undoubtedly done to cover the crime of robbery and prevent all efforts on his part to identify or capture the robbers when he should recover. That murder was necessary to accomplish the robbery is, of course, improbable. The man was unconscious, and it is quite likely that he continued in this state for some time, as his fainting was thought to have been the result of sunstroke, from which he had once before suffered. It is not unlikely that the man was coolly murdered as the shortest way to get rid of him, and the inhumanity and fiendishness of the crime scarcely has a parallel. Thieves are generally content to get away with plunder, without bearing the blood of a victim on their hands, and even the worst of men usually proceed to extremities only as a last resort. But if this man was killed, as is generally supposed, it was a needless and causeless crime, even from the highwayman's standpoint, and is so shocking as to be incredible without the evidence which makes it incontestible.

What occurred after the fainting man was carried from his seat and placed in a carriage at the Driving Park may never be known; but, on the theory that he was carried to his death, it may be imagined. Helpless in the hands of fiends, no one in the busy streets dreaming that the passing carriage contained a friendless man in the power of cutthroats, the horrible scene was enacted. Perhaps the body, breathing but still unconscious, was dumped into the lake, to be floated ashore after days had elapsed, and identified; or, if the body discovered in the waves on Thursday proves to be some one else, then the victim may have been carried far into the country, murdered and hidden forever from sight in a rude and hasty grave. The fact that the men who carried the helpless man away cannot be found is of itself strong proof that their work was villainous beyond description.

[NOTE.—The body referred to by the Inter Ocean was not that of Mr. Walls, and bore no resemblance to the missing man.]

Curious Growths in Old Nevada Mines.

A gentleman who recently had occasion to explore the chambers, drifts and caverns of the old deserted Mexican and Ophir mines says that fungi of every imaginable kind have taken possession of the old levels.

In these old mines, undisturbed for years, is seen a fungus world in which are to be seen a counterfeit of almost everything in our daylight world. Owing to the warmth of the old levels and to the presence in them of a certain amount of moisture, the timbers have been made to grow some curious crops. Some of the fungi in the old chambers are several feet in height, and, being snow white, resemble sheeted ghosts. In places are what at a little distance appear to be white owls, and there are representations of goats with long beards, all as white as though carved in the purest marble. The rank fungus growth has almost closed some of the drifts.

The fungi are of almost every imaginable variety. Some kinds hang down from the timbers like great bunches of snow-white hair, and others are great pulpy masses. These last generally rise from the rocks, forming the floor of the drifts, and seem to have grown from something dropped or spilled on the ground at the time work was in progress years ago. These growths have in several places raised from the ground rocks weighing from ten to fifty and even 100 pounds. Some of the rocks have thus been lifted more than three feet.

In the higher levels, where the air is comparatively dry, the fungi are less massive in structure than below, and are much firmer in texture. Some resemble rams' horns, as they grow in a spiral or twisted shape, while others, four or five feet in length and about the thickness of a broom-handle, hang from the cap timbers like so many snakes suspended by the tails. One kind, after sending out a stem of the thickness of a pencil to the length of a foot or two, appears to blossom—at least, produces at the end a bulbous mass that has some resemblance to a flower. In all the infinite variety of these underground fungi it is somewhat strange that not one was seen at all like those growing upon the surface in the light of day. Nothing in the nature of toadstools or mushrooms was found.

City and Country.

The city population of England, according to the last census, is vigorously increasing, while the rural, which, according to the census of 1871, was proved to be stagnant, is actually, in some parts of the West at least, growing less. It does not prove that England is becoming less able to feed itself because the agricultural element of the population is diminishing. The soil can be worked with much fewer hands now than of old, and the farms will send more food to the cities when less is consumed at home. The converse of the proposition is, a given number of agriculturists needs more space for its operations, and this can be better found in America and Australia than in England. —New York Tribune.

CROP REPORTS.

The Minneapolis Tribune prints estimates of the yield of wheat in every county of Minnesota, showing as follows: Total yield, 40,866,680 bushels; average per acre, a fraction less than fourteen bushels; excess over last year, 1,484,880 bushels. Nearly all the grain in the State will grade No. 1. Oats and barley are a fine yield. Corn prospect unequaled crop.

A telegram from Des Moines, Iowa, says: "The reports so far gathered at this point from most of the counties are rather discouraging for a good crop. Wheat, taking the State over, will hardly yield the seed used in planting. Thousands of acres have not been touched, and others harvested which left the farmer in debt for the cost of harvesting."

A gentleman who lately returned to Lincoln, Neb., from the western part of the State, reports corn in a very bad condition. He says that some fields are "all dried up," and that, unless there is rain soon, the crop will be almost a total failure in Western Nebraska.

A Kansas City paper prints reports from nearly every town in Kansas reached by telegraph giving the condition of the crops. "Considerable alarm has been caused by the continued dry weather, but the reports are in the main cheering, showing that the damage up to the present time has been much less than feared here. Taking into account the increased acreage and the failure of the crops in the western portion of the State last year, it seems fair to estimate that this year's crop of both wheat and corn in Kansas will be nearly up to the amount produced last year, provided rain comes in a week or so. Some sections have suffered severely, while others will produce an average crop. In localities which suffered last year, with some exceptions, there is a cheering prospect at present. Taken all in all, there is as yet no cause for serious alarm. Reports from Southwestern Missouri are much the same as from Kansas."

Our Tobacco Production.

The fifteen States of Kentucky, Virginia, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Tennessee, North Carolina, Maryland, Connecticut, Missouri, Wisconsin, Indiana, New York, Massachusetts, Illinois, and West Virginia, in the order named, still produce, as in 1870, more than ninety-nine per cent. of the tobacco of the United States, though it is reported in twenty-two other States and six Territories. Of these fifteen, only Missouri, Illinois, Indiana and Massachusetts produce less than in 1870. Kentucky produces thirty-six per cent. of the total product of the country. Virginia holds the second place; Pennsylvania has advanced from the twelfth to the third; Wisconsin from the fifteenth to the tenth; and North Carolina, Connecticut and New York have each gained one point in the rank of tobacco States. Those that have not retrograded in relative production are Massachusetts, Maryland, West Virginia Indiana, Illinois, Missouri and Tennessee.

The apparent increase in production during the decade is 80 per cent., which exaggerates the real advance in tobacco cultivation, as the preceding census crop was a small one and the fear of taxation may have operated to prevent a full census of tobacco in 1870. The crop reported in 1880 was one of medium production, not in excess of the present requirements of home consumption and exportation. The average yield per acre is 731 pounds, as shown by the totals. The variation in yield, from 1599 in Massachusetts to 471 in North Carolina, is pronounced by Mr. Dodge, statistician, due in differing degree to the use or neglect of fertilizers, the habit of growth of different varieties, and the vicissitudes of the seasons. In Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania and Wisconsin, the seed-leaf varieties are mainly grown, and high fertilization practiced, always resulting in comparatively heavy crops. In Ohio the yield is above the average, the Ohio seed-leaf being extensively cultivated in the Miami Valley, while the Burley, a vigorous grower of a less productive class, is almost exclusive in its prominence in the Ohio River counties, Kentucky, producing many grades of cutting and shipping tobaccos, upon an exhausted soil of great original fertility, make an average yield. In Maryland, Virginia and West Virginia the yield is better than the general average. The low yield in North Carolina is a necessity of the production of the fashionable yellow "bright" grade used for plug wrapper, grown on a poor soil.—Little Rock Gazette.

THE New York Graphic reports that "an old angler, who is vouched for as being 'as reliable as any fisherman on the river,' claims to have caught five glimpses of a mermaid in the Ohio, near Marietta. He says that it comes to the surface, looks about it and then gradually sinks, leaving its beautifully long and glossy black hair floating for a moment on the water. He represents it as having the face of a woman, and says that he didn't shoot the strange creature because he feared that if he did he would 'get into some sort of a murder trial.' When asked whether the mermaid carried a comb or looking glass, he resisted temptation and answered: 'It might have, but I didn't see any.'"

A BOSTON brewer says that men in a brewery never get drunk, although they drink often, and gives as a reason that they stick to one kind of beer and do not mix their drinks.

Diet of Alaskan Barbarians.

They live largely on ukali (dried fish) with fresh fish in season, and occasionally take a beluga or white whale, besides many hair seals. They do not take kindly to bread or tea, so the traders say. When they are so fortunate as to capture a beluga the whole village indulges in feasting while it lasts, gorging themselves upon the flesh immoderately.

I believe that alternate feasting and fasting are characteristic habits of nearly all barbarous peoples. Capt. Cook, in his "Third Voyage," relates what he saw upon a certain occasion when the Aleut chief of Ounalaska made his dinner off the raw head of a large halibut just caught. After two of his servants had eaten the gills, with no dressing except squeezing out the slime, one of them cut off the head of the fish, washed it in the sea, and then laid it upon the grass near the chief, at the same time strewing some more grass before the great man to serve as a tablecloth. The attendant then cut large pieces off the cheek of the fish and laid them within reach of the grand mogul, "who swallowed them with as much satisfaction as we should do raw oysters." When the chief had done, the remains of the fish's head were cut in pieces and given to the attendants, "who tore off the meat with their teeth, and gnawed the bones like so many dogs." Capt. Lyon, the arctic explorer, gives in his Journal an even more disgusting account of an Esquimaux meal. "From Koollittuck," he says, "I learned a new Esquimaux luxury. He had eaten until he was drunk, and every moment fell asleep, with a flushed and burning face and his mouth open. By his side sat Arnaloosa (his wife), who was attending her cooking pot, and at short intervals awakened her spouse, in order to cram as much as was possible of a large piece of half-boiled flesh into his mouth with the assistance of her forefinger, and, having filled it quite full, cut off the morsel close to his lips. During this operation the happy man moved no part of him but his jaws, not even opening his eyes, but his extreme satisfaction was occasionally shown by a most expressive grunt whenever he enjoyed sufficient room for the passage of sound. The drippings of the savory repast had so plentifully covered his face and neck that I had no hesitation in determining that a man may look more like a beast by overeating than by drinking to excess."

But enough of this; enough is as good as a feast, even an Esquimaux feast. On the other hand, when putrid whale meat and other native luxuries are scarce, these versatile creatures can adapt themselves to the situation and rival Tanner in fasting. They will worry along for days, and even weeks, on the smallest possible amount of food—nothing more than a little ukali once every day or two.

So the "attending physicians" say. It must have been their hungry season when I was at St. Michael's, for squads of them were hanging around the trader's kitchen door at every meal hour, where they maintained their positions with unflinching fortitude, and waited in eloquent silence and with speaking looks until the calls of the stomach were answered with broken victuals.

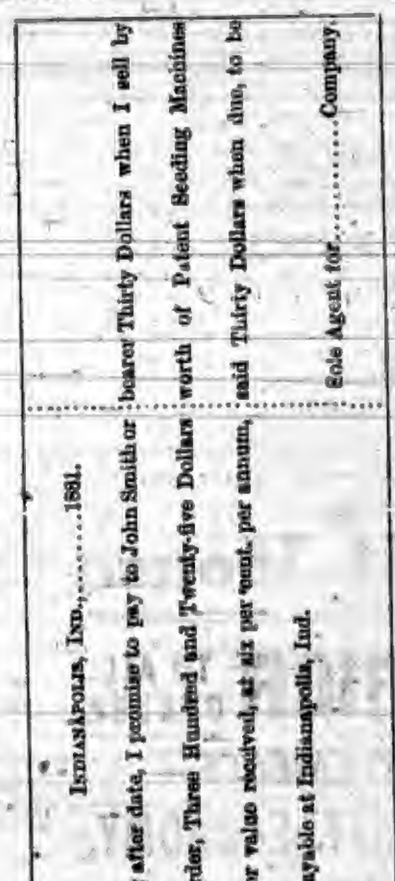
Swindlers at Work Among Indiana Farmers.

[Indianapolis Letter to Cincinnati Enquirer.]

This city seems to be the headquarters of a number of scoundrels engaged in swindling the unsuspecting and covetous grangers throughout the State. They deal mostly in patent-right frauds of various kinds, from pitchforks to machines of more value on the farm. The farmers have often been warned against these gentry by the press, but they readily change their tactics and assume all sorts of protean forms for intrapping the unwary, and scarcely a day passes that some countryman is not made the victim of the wicked wiles of the ubiquitous scamps. The latest heard of is a gang who go about selling an alleged seeding machine, and these have victimized a number of people. The reader is hereby presented with a fac simile of the "contract" drawn by these patent-seeding-machine fellows, which they induce farmers to sign, and which shortly afterward turns up as a plain note of hand in the possession of some paper-shaver in his neighborhood who has purchased the same of the swindlers. It is as follows:



INDIANAPOLIS, IND., ...1881.
One year after date, I promise to pay to John Smith or bearer Thirty Dollars when I sell by order, Three Hundred and Twenty-five Dollars worth of Patent Seeding Machines for value received, at six per cent. per annum, said Thirty Dollars when due, to be payable at Indianapolis, Ind. Sole Agent for............Company.

The swindlers go to a well-to-do farmer and tell him he has been recommended as a good man to sell their machines, and ask him to become their agent. He is persuaded that they sell rapidly, and that he can make a large per cent. profit. He is told that he will not be expected to risk any money or pay anything until he has sold $325 worth of the machines. He is induced to sign the contract above given, which, it will be seen, sets forth this agreement when read straight across. It looks fair and innocent enough, and soon the farmer, typified in the foregoing document as John Smith, puts his name in the blank space just before the words "Sole Agent for —— Company." Afterward the scamps easily change the document from a contract to sell into a promissory note by tearing off that part to the right of the line drawn through the agreement as printed. In the original presented to the farmers of course no line appears; and it is given here simply to show where the division takes place, and the separation at which point so radically changes the nature of the document. It will be seen at a glance that this is liable to deceive any one without close inspection, and a number of Indiana farmers have been cheated with them this summer. The last heard of the gang they were operating extensively in Bartholomew county. After the farmers' notes get into the hands of "innocent purchasers," there is no recourse but to pay them off, as they cannot well go back on the signatures.

Another Reformer.

Mr. Windom has himself advertised as a reformer. In this respect he follows in the tracks of Mr. Sherman, who did more to debauch the public service than any of his predecessors in the treasury. He not only rewarded the infamous creatures who, under his personal supervision, at New Orleans, did the work by which the Presidency was stolen, but he openly used the patronage of his department to purchase delegates to the Chicago Convention.

The Secretary who did these things and others equally bad was very much shocked at the management of the Custom House under Gen. Arthur, and after dismissing him and Gov. Cornell upon serious charges proved his sincerity by supporting one for Governor and the other for Vice President, for no better reason than that they were regularly nominated as candidates by the Republican machine. Regularity gave them absolution, and the stains of selfish accusation were wiped out.

What has the present Secretary done to recommend him to favor? It became notorious that the contingent fund of the treasury, averaging about $125,000 a year, was squandered and stolen by a ring in the department; that the public property was carried off and appropriated to personal uses; that collusive contracts were made for the profit of corrupt officials and their confederates; that skilled labor employed at the public expense was utilized in private, and that the whole system of expenditure was rotten and disgraceful.

That organization was illegally made by Mr. Sherman, who has been repeatedly charged with having been one of its direct beneficiaries. He created the office of custodian, so called, and appointed an Ohio man to fill it, who at the same time served as the personal agent of Mr. Sherman's large property at Washington, acquired from the economies of his salary as member of Congress. When Mr. Sherman went out of the treasury, clerks who did not dare to utter a word about this corruption while he was Secretary, on the pain of dismissal, were emboldened to speak out, and the facts were made known to his successor.

Mr. Windom could not avoid the form of an investigation without inviting suspicion and criticism. He ordered a committee of his own subordinates to examine the charges, and it is known that their report substantially confirmed all that had been publicly alleged, with cautious reserve in language to obviate vengeance. That report was suppressed because it implicated prominent Republicans in office and out. Mr. Windom contented himself with abolishing the custodian's place, while he protected his political friends against present exposure, and retained some men in office who had shared in this plunder and are possessed of troublesome secrets. This is Mr. Windom's method of reforming the most scandalous abuses in his own department; and before many months have passed away Pitney, the former custodian and John Sherman's agent, will, no doubt, be again on the pay rolls.

But it is said the House of Representatives will investigate these transactions and expose the guilty beneficiaries. Experience does not justify confidence in any remedy from that quarter. Republican Speakers and Republican committees have hitherto uniformly whitewashed their official partisans when charged with corruption, and have condoned their crimes.

There is no reason to expect an exception in the present case. No matter who the Republican Speaker may be, he will pack the committee if an investigation should be ordered; and every member of that committee will either have friends in office to protect or he will have friends who want places. The public patronage will be used, as it has been for twelve years past, to cover up fraud and venality, and the old story will be repeated.

And when Mr. Windom shall have silenced the treasury scandals by these means, and by others equally reprehensible, he will bloom forth as a reform Republican candidate for the Presidency, and will doubtless be supported by professional reformers and professional politicians with zeal and pertinacity.—New York Sun.

The Pulpy Miller.

Senator Warner Miller signalized his first political utterance since his election by delivering a speech before the Paper-Makers' Association at Saratoga, in which he showed that he has not severed, and does not propose to sever the thrifty ties which bind his private interests to his public duties. In other words, Mr. Miller boldly and frankly announces that he is "on the make," and intends using his Senatorial office to help himself to all the money that comes in his way. He was struck with the fact "that it seemed natural for paper-makers to go into politics," a remark which has the merit of truthfulness rather than of novelty.

A wood-pulp man whose profits are guaranteed him by a tariff of 25 or 30 per cent. naturally "takes to politics," in order to see that that happy condition of things remains assured to him. He goes into politics exactly as the James boys go into a railroad train, not for the pleasure of an excursion on the rail, but to burst open the express safe and rob the passengers; or as a fish-hawk goes naturally into the water, for the sake of picking up the unlucky fishes. He, moreover, remarked further that he would like to sell his paper in South America, but, owing to the United States tariff on ship-building materials and the absurd navigation laws, there are no steamers by which he can send his paper there; so he further announced that from his seat in the Senate he should vote enough money out of the pockets of the people of the United States, to enable him to sell his paper at a profit in Brazil. That so impudent a raider on the public treasury should think it "as well for the Government to pay for prompt and perfect mail lines to foreign ports as for star routes in Western Territories," may be accepted as a matter of course. Steamship subsidies and star routes are all of a piece, and a man capable of voting the one to aid him in his private business cannot be greatly disturbed at voting in favor of the other, and giving Brady as clean a certificate of character as that treasury raider could well ask. Mr. Miller begins well and will bear watching, for when such a Miller is done grinding his grist, as in the old story, one horse can take home what it took two horses to bring to the mill.—Detroit Free Press.

Will He Do It?

Of Mr. Conkling's solemn promise—by telegraph—to renew the struggle in the near future, and to vindicate the stalwarts by the promulgation of facts in his possession, the New York Sun says:

We do not in the least doubt that Mr. Conkling might, if he chose, make a terrible exposure of half-breed duplicity, greed and corruption. But will he ever do it? He has a bad habit of mysteriously foreshadowing great things which never occur. He was going to blast the conspiracy which reversed the verdict of the ballot-boxes and put Hayes in Mr. Tilden's office; but he never did it. He was just about to tell the whole story of the treaty at Mentor; but we have not got it yet. He has been from the beginning of the contest at Albany on the very eve of making disclosures which would startle the country, and reverse the whole order of things; but nothing has come of it.

We have learned from these experiences to place but little faith in Mr. Conkling's proclamations, and prefer to wait for the performance. But the public will agree with us that in his last declaration—the telegram above—he has voluntarily undertaken a duty which he cannot shirk without personal disgrace. With no more delay than may be necessary for reasonable accuracy and prudent preparation, he is bound to expose those "forbidden and abhorrent forces and agencies" which elected Lapham and Miller.

Queen Elizabeth's English.

We are reminded, says a writer in Belgravia, of the celebrated letter of Queen Elizabeth to Sir Christopher Hatton, by Stoke Pogis manor. It was invested in his daughter-in-law,—the widow of Sir William Hatton, who married Sir E. Coke, and it does not seem that she was happy with the great man, for they lived separately for some time; and, on hearing of the death of Coke she went at once to claim it with her brother, Lord Wimbledon; but at Colnebrook she met the physician, who assured her that the great lawyer had improved in health, and she went back to London much disappointed.

There is more than one version of Sir Christopher Hatton's obtaining possession of the Bishop of Ely's house in Holborn. It is even said that in the first instance he only wished to build a town-house in the garden, but the Bishop objected, and then he thought that Ely Place itself would suit him better, and hence the well-known letter of the Queen to the Bishop. But probably there was really a gentle hint to his Lordship that the Lord Keeper wanted the house for his town residence on lease, and that was sufficient to induce the prelate to offer it. Queen Elizabeth, then having herself taken a fancy to it, occupied it in place of the Lord Keeper; but a new Bishop of Ely, who considered the see and all its belongings sacred, entered an objection to the arrangement, and received the reply which makes anything in the "Complete Letter Writer" read very weak indeed:

"PROUD PRELATE: You know what you was before I made you what you are now; if you do not immediately comply with my request, by —— I will unfrock you. ELIZABETH."

About Moths.

The destruction caused by these little pests can only be counted by millions yearly, and they are the plague of every housekeeper. Unless you hermetically seal a cask or box you can scarcely keep a miller out, as she will crawl through a good-sized pin-hole. Therefore we must use something offensive, and the writer has found nothing so effective and cheap as petroleum paper, and even tar-roofing paper will answer. Buy your paper in rolls, cut in sections long enough to cover the inside, the bottom and the sides, and lap over on the top of the box. All of the inside of the box must be covered, and on the inside of this again place wrapping paper to prevent the contact of nice clothing with the petroleum paper. Use a large box—no matter about its being very tight, as the paper will cover the holes—and pack in all your woolens and furs, filling it full. Bring the paper up which has been hanging over the sides of the box, and let it cover the hole so that the miller cannot enter without crawling over the petroleum paper, which she will never do. Nail on the cover of your box, and your clothing is safe for three years, if you wish to leave it that long. It is much cheaper and does not evaporate like camphor, and the carbolic acid in it seems to act like an antiseptic on the animal fiber of the wool, to preserve and make it healthful.—Exchange.

A Queen in Her Own Right.

What is pride? Pride is the possession which constantly urges us to rise above our fellow beings. Pride is the chief cause of the rise and fall of thrones, of feuds among families and friends, of wars, of duels, of discords which we would never witness were it not for the odious sentiment, pride. Pride of wealth and fame, of beauty and accomplishments, of ancestry, all these are different kinds of false pride.

Pride of wealth heads the list. What is not done to obtain riches? Even in this enlightened era, many would sell their souls to the legendary fiend of medieval times, if possible, to obtain more wealth than their neighbors.

Fame comes next. What horrors are not passed through in order to become notorious, in order to leave to posterity a name covered with glory; to attain the eminent hights of power and domineer over nations?

Then comes pride of beauty, which, though seeming less powerful, is stronger yet than all other kinds of pride combined. A beautiful woman's aim in life consists in hightening her style of beauty, in becoming the belle of society and airing her accomplishments. All her better feelings are sacrificed to pride.

Last, but not least, comes the foolish pride of ancestry, a doting hobby of narrow-minded people who prefer the man with a pedigree to an honest one. Are not all honest men equal? Thrice blessed be America, my native land, where the finger of scorn is not pointed at a man not descending in direct line from barons of the feudal times.

My dissertation against sinful pride does not imply that we should be entirely devoid of honest pride. We must, on the contrary, be very proud of an unsullied name, of a pure career, of a life of goodness and of all honorable actions and virtues.

A Kentucky girl, most beautiful and accomplished, the reigning belle of the fashionable circles of New York, New Orleans and Washington, while visiting Rome, was presented to the Pope. "Kneel, my daughter," said he, as she stood erect in her imperial grace before him; "all kneel to me except the daughters of sovereigns."

"I am a princess in my own right, your Holiness," she replied.

"How can that be, when you are an American born?"

"In my country the people are sovereigns, and I am a daughter of the people."

Does Pleasure Pay?

With the above words an English society journal opens an article on the current habit of good society in search of pleasure. It is unnecessay to say that pleasure, if it can be taken only as many fashionables take it, is not worth the time and money that it costs. No one enjoys this world's diversions so little as those who pay most for their fun and devote most time to it. At the theatre and opera the people who appear most pleased are those who sit in the cheapest seats and wear the poorest clothes, and elsewhere the rule is the same. All else being equal, the man who has the most money to spend can secure the most enjoyment in this world; but one thing that thousands of people seem to forget is, that with all these things with pleasant possibilties a common rule of the table holds good—it is no use to eat unless you have an appetite. The most forlorn dinner out in New York is the man who eats several dinners daily, and the the most unhappy man at the theatre—the man who finds fault with everything and enjoys nothing—is he who goes to the theatre every night. Pleasure is like desert—very good to take after something substantial, but the most unsatisfactory of all things taken as a steady diet.

"Had Rather be Kicked."

Physicians frequently send patients to take riding lessons, particularly persons whose occupations are of a sedentary character. One stout, red-faced merchant, a little past middle age, who was so recommended by his doctor, came up to try the prescription one morning last autumn. He had not been on a horse since he was a boy, he said. They put him on an easy-going, tractable horse, and he jogged about the ring for one hour faithfully. Then he dismounted stiffly, with many grimaces and a few pithy remarks, waddled into the office, and declared himself. "That," said he, "lets me out. I can get exactly the same results for half the money and in half the time, by hiring my porter to kick me."—Exchange.

THE PASTILLE
Prof. Harris' Radical Cure
Trade Mark
FOR

BY YEARS OF USE!

A valuable Discovery and New Departure in Medical Science. A positively effective Remedy for the speedy and permanent Cure for organic weakness—the deplorable disease resulting from indiscreet practices or excesses in youth or at any time of life—by the only true way, viz: Direct Application acting by Absorption, and exerting its specific influence on the Vesicles, Ducts, and Gland, that are unable to perform their natural functions while this disease pervades the human organism. The use of the Pastille is attended with no pain or inconvenience, and does not interfere with the ordinary pursuits of life; it is quickly dissolved and soon absorbed, producing an immediate soothing and restorative effect upon the nervous organizations wrecked from vicious habits or excesses, stopping the drain from the system, restoring the mind to health and sound memory, removing the Dimness of Sight, Confusion of Ideas, Aversion to Society, etc., etc., and the appearance of premature old age usually accompanying this trouble, and restoring the vital forces, where they have been dormant for years. This mode of treatment has stood the test in very severe cases, and is now a pronounced success. Drugs are too much prescribed in this trouble, and, as many can bear witness to, with but little if any permanent good. There is no nonsense about this Preparation. Practical observation enables us to positively guarantee that it will give satisfaction. It has been in general use for several years and we have thousands of testimonials from patients, as to its value, and it is now conceded to be the most rational means yet discovered for reaching and curing this very prevalent trouble, that is well known to be the cause of untold misery to so many, and upon whom quacks prey with their useless nostrums and big fees. The Remedy is put up in neat boxes, of three sizes. No. 1, (enough to last a month,) $3; No. 2, (sufficient to effect a permanent cure, unless in severe cases,) $5; No. 3, (lasting over three months, will restore those in the worst condition,) $7. Sent by mail, in plain wrappers. Full DIRECTIONS for using will accompany EACH BOX.

Send for Sealed Descriptive Pamphlets giving Anatomical Illustrations and Testimony, which will convince the most skeptical that they can be restored to perfect health, and the vital forces thoroughly re-established same as if never affected. Sold ONLY by Unsolicited testimony to the Efficacy of Prof. Harris' Pastilles, taken from Letters received from Patrons:

Indiana, April 11, '78.—The Remedy is working perfectly. Had epilepsy from weakness, for 9 years past.

Iowa, Oct. 15th, '78.—I am almost surprised at your Pastilles. They have worked like a charm on me. I am just twice as much of a man as I was before taking. I was on the verge of the grave, I thought, and there was no cure for me, but now I am in good hopes for a cure.

West Virginia, Aug. 25, 1879.—I received your medicine and I believe it has cured me, for which I am very thankful. Inclosed find $5. Please send me another box (No. 2) for a friend. You have done a great thing for me. I will send you all the orders I can.

From a Physician and Surgeon.

Missouri, June 22.—Please forward me another box of the Pastilles. The patient on whom I have used most of one box, in addition to a [illegible] box, is fast recovering, and I think another will set him all right.

From a Druggist.

Maryland, Sept. 2 '79.—Last January we got a box of your Remedy for one of our customers, and it has made a perfect cure of him. We have another customer suffering in the same way, and wish one No. 3 box.

His Last Words.

"The Americans are outdone," triumphantly declares a French editor, and to prove it he relates this singular story:

Lately at Calcutta a dangerous criminal was arrested and condemned to death. On the day of the execution, when the jailer was about to prepare the condemned man for the supreme moment, an English gentleman arrived hurriedly and presented an order from the governor of the city authorizing him to hold a private interview with the prisoner.

They were left alone for a quarter of hour, and when they separated the condemned man was heard to say:

"It is distinctly understood that you will give £10,000 sterling to my heirs?"

"I Swear it upon the Bible," replied the mysterious Englishman.

The prisoner was then prepared and led to the scaffold, where he claimed the exercise of the right always awarded to those about to suffer execution—the right before dying to say a farewell word. Advancing to the front of the scaffold, he at once won the attention of those present, and then exclaimed in a stentorian voice: "The best chocolate in the world is that of the firm of So-and-So of Piccadilly, London."

Then he calmly yielded himself to the executioner.

The Aristocratic Artichoke.

The Carson Appeal remarks that the artichoke, a vegetable only appreciated by the most refined epicurean palates, is in the market. It is but right to explain that the kind of artichoke meant by the Appeal is not the old-fashioned tuber which grows in the ground, similar to the potato, but is a Japanese invention made of bamboo. It is something like a small cabbage, and in eating it, the bamboo layers are picked off one at a time, and dipped in a sauce of vinegar and mustard. The vinegar is intended to soften the fibres of the bamboo and the mustard is to distroy whatever taste it may possibly have. As in chewing tobacco, one must have an educated appetite before he can appreciate the artichoke.

Wicked for Clergymen.

Rev. ——, Washington, D. C., writes: "I believe it to be all wrong and even wicked for clergymen or other public men to be led into giving testimonials to quack doctors or vile stuffs called medicines, but when a really meritorious article made of valuable remedies known to all, that all physicians use and trust in daily, we should freely commend it. I therefore cheerfully and heartily commend Hop Bitters for the good they have done me and my friends, firmly believing they have no equal for family use. I will not be without them."—[New York Baptist Weekly. 33-2t.

My Tormented Back"

is the exclamation of more than one poor hard-working man and woman. Do you know why it aches? It is because your kidneys are over-tasked and need strengthening, and your system needs to be cleansed of bad humors. Kidney-Wort is the medicine you need. "It acts like a charm," says a well known physician, "I never knew it to fail." Liquid or dry sold by druggists.—[Boston Post.

Holloway's Pills.

Never despair—something that never fails—Fever and Ague—To the sick it is of little consequence how they are cured, whether from a rational view of the disease or by the rules defined for the guidance of the profession, so long as the cure is certain and expeditious. To a suffering man the question on the relative merits of quinine or calomel is uninteresting. The faculty may wrangle and discuss their various theories, but Dr. Holloway's treatment dispels doubt ere the disciples of Esculapius have finished the first stage. Holloway's Pills are the only remedies which effect a speedy and radical cure without danger of a relapse. Read the advertisement elsewhere.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the signature of J. HAYDOCK surrounds each box of Pills and Ointment. Boxes at 25 cents, 62 cents and $1 each.

How Watches are Made.

It will be apparent to any one, who will examine a SOLID GOLD WATCH, that aside from the necessary thickness for engraving and polishing, a large porportion of the precious metal used is needed only to stiffen and hold the engraved portions in place, and supply the necessary solidity and strength. The surplus gold is actually needless so far as UTILITY and beauty are concerned. In JAMES BOSS' PATENT GOLD WATCH CASES, this WASTE of precious metal is overcome, and the SAME SOLIDITY AND STRENGTH produced at from one-third to one half of the usual cost of solid cases. This process is of the most simple nature, as follows: a plate of nickle composition metal, especially adapted to the purpose, has two plates of SOLID GOLD soldered one on each side. The three are then passed between polished steel rollers, and the result is a strip of heavy plated composition, from which the cases, backs, centres, bezels etc., are cut and shaped by suitable dies and formers. The gold in these cases is sufficiently thick to admit of all kinds of chasing, engraving and enameling; the engraved cases have been carried until worn perfectly smooth by time and use without removing the gold.

THIS IS THE ONLY CASE MADE WITH TWO PLATES OF SODID GOLD AND WARRANTED BY SPECIAL CERTIFICATE.

For sale by all Jewelers. Ask for Illustrated Catalogue, and to see warrant.

Communication.

SAN JOSE, CAL., Aug. 2, 1881.

EDITORS COURIER.—I arrived at this place June 23, quite sick and a good deal tired, consequently it was a little time before I saw the city of which I heard nothing but praises on my way, and now after a six weeks stay I hardly know how to write of it, though I know it must be studied and experienced before it can be fully appreciated. I have seen many nicer looking business blocks than I find here, and as to the general appearance of the business portion of the city I see nothing particularly commendable above other places of this size. But when we come to the home life, the advantages and facilities for real enjoyment and improvement, it seems to me San Jose is incomparable in my experience. Situated in a now very fertile valley, since being subjected by the skill and energy of human brains and hands, where a few years ago there was little vegetation, the brown earth now responds to man's caresses with bounteous abundance of fruits and grains. The climate and soil were here, but the moisture, the rainfall was wanting; but as "necessity is the mother of invention" man thoug't to supply artifically this need by irigaing. It is part of the daily care and labor of each household to water the yards, grass plots, gardens and shrubbery. They apply the water through a hose which receives its supply from the city water works the same as the town does. The reservoir for the water used by the city is fifteen miles away. The water is not soft, yet they use it for clothes washing and the garments look very white and nice. Some use a little ammonia to soften the water. Chinese do most of the washing. Families who wish, get their washing and ironing done out of the house for from seventy-five cents to two dollars per week. It is quite a sight to see the many feet of clothes line often stretched upon the house roofs, which are flat, or sometimes on vacant lots, looking like acres of washed clothes. I am told that country people for some distance about send their washing out to these Chinese laundrys. The shirts, collars and white dresses are usuall done very nicely, but common clothes get very poor ironing. The Chinese, of course, attract the attention of strangers, they are so peculiar. I have seen only two China women and one child, probably three years old, but even these tender years gave promise of the inevitable cue, for it was sprouted six or eight inches in length. The women dress very much like the men in the fashion of their garments, which are made of some shining black material and their trousers are a trifle wider. They wear earings in their ears and their shining black hair is combed smoothly from the face, slightly puffed at the sides, coiled and fastened in a round, flat manner at the back of the head, much like American women have sometimes arranged the hair. I saw one woman on the street who had no covering on her head, and one I saw in the depot and on the cars with her husband, I suppose, but her hair was her only head ornament or protector. They lunched at the depot, she sitting crosslegged on the seat conversing with her companion in their natural language. After lunch she drew forth two cigarettes, lighted and gave one to the man, and enjoyed the other herself. Her hands were small and brown, with taper fingers, and her little feet she withdrew from her cork soled slippers and hid under her gown while she sat, and when she came to walk shoved her feet into them instantly with no seeming exertion or hindrance. I thought of a hen who had lost her toes by frost when I saw her move away on her diminutive pedal extremities. I visited Chinatown once in San Jose, but have no desire to renew my investigations in that direction. A stench greeted my olfactories at every turn, which was sufficient for a lifetime, and I will never hear the word "Chinatown" without instinctively trying to hold my pocket-handkerchief to my nose.

The residents of this town were not very communicative, and showed us quite plainly that they did not relish prying eyes, but I stealthily peeped into a few of their dark, illy-ventilated dens. One fellow was enjoying his evening meal, which was contained in a dark dish sitting on a shelf the height of an ordinary table. He was squatted on his bare feet on the top of a stool, same height of shelf-table, with two chop sticks between the fingers of his right hand. With these sticks he fished up his food and conveyed it to his mouth as only a Chinaman or woman can do it. Many Chinamen are employed as kitchen servants at wages from twenty to thirty-five dollars per month, and they are all very careful to do no extra work at that. I believe I do not like the Chinamen very well, but it is not on account of his cheap labor. There are many miles of beautiful drives in and about San Jose, with streets well sprinkled and thoroughly shaded, and on each side large frame residences, dressed in architectural beauty, large roomy yards containing flowers and shrubs, green lawns and sometimes fountains and statuary. There is a great deal of wealth here, consequently elegant homes. This is the golden state, and we no longer need to save the pennies to make the dollars, for they spring forth fully developed of themselves, and if you have not been fortunate enough to secure a full purse, you may as well return to the land of pennies, for the dollars do not lie here loosely in the dust as they did a few years ago; and the people who have gathered the golden harvest do not appreciate values as we do, but scatter of their abundance with a lavish hand—rashly, speculate and toy with their treasure. Fancied poised on the gilded round of fortunes ladder, they realize not their giddy height till their financial crash sobers them off for a new struggle with the fickle goddess, and some are many times successful, while others become hopelessly mad; consequently California has large and full insane asylums, and the inmates are not all men, for women buy mining stocks and engage in other speculations as their brothers do. People of San Jose spend a great deal of money for pleasure. They are within a few hours ride of the mountains and of the sea, and each family must spend a few days at one or both of these pleasure resorts because they enjoy it, and it has become a habit and not the least a fashion; and they must have a salt bath or a few breaths of mountain air in a tent, or—well, they wouldn't be tony whether they would be healthy or not. We went to Camp Capitola by rail, over the wildest, most picturesque mountain scenery you can imagine, and sat in the beautiful clear sand of the wave-beaten shore of the Pacific, and I donned a bathing suit and tried to breast the angry wave, but I only succeeded in measuring waist deep till I was so chilled that I thought best to "flee the frozen flood," and it took hours of lying in the sun and sand to warm me thoroughly. There were many who enjoyed the bathing, but all felt that it was too cold for real comfort, and none stay in more than thirty or forty minutes many scarcely five. The Pacific is much colder than the Atlantic, for I enjoyed bathing on the coast of New Jersey. "Do I like San Jose?" Yes, most emphatically. No place had I rather have our home. Good schools, society, plenty of all kinds of excellent fruit nearly the year around, and at a moderate price, though it is true each kind of fruit comes in its season, only that season is longer than east—most beautiful wheat flour, a variety of scenery that no other place affords, no cyclones, no whirlwinds, no grasshoppers, no thunder storms, no danger of rain from May till December, when commences what they call winter; that is, sometimes a slight frost and occasional rainy days to beautify the brown face of nature and make the pathway muddy, for San Jose has only earth for sidewalks as a rule.

As to temperature of climate, I saw no uncomfortably warm days while in the city, and must confess that I was much of the time too cold with woolen stockings and flannel underwear, as we had no fire in the grate, I sometimes sought the kitchen stove, but if we went a few miles further inland, the heat we found very offensive. They have very few house flies here. The dust I had expected would be very disagreeable. Of course we get none of it in the city because of the sprinklers, but far away in the country where no water wagon goes, the dust gave me no more inconvenience than in Indiana, after a brief drought. San Jose is the only place in California that seems to me desirable for a home, and here in this favored region people suffer from catarrh much as elsewhere, and are subject to nearly all diseases; and maybe we will not pitch our tent here, though I wish it might be. For our mountain trip, we visited the Yosemite.

Andrew Jackson's Escape.

THE ATTEMPT TO KILL HIM BY A LUNATIC IN WASHINGTON CITY.

Senator Thomas H. Benton, in his "Thirty Years View," or history of the workings of the American Government from 1820 to 1850, gives the following account of the attempted assassination of President Jackson:

"On Friday, the 30th of January, 1832, the president with some members of the cabinet, attended the funeral services of Warren R. Davis in the hall of the House of Representatives, of which body Mr Davis had been a member from the state of South Carolina. The procession had moved out with the body, and its front had reached the foot of the broad steps of the eastern portico, when the president, with Mr. Woodbury, secretary of the treasury, were issuing from the door of the great rotunda, which opens upon the portico. At that instant a person stepped from the crowd into the little open space in front of the president, levelled a pistol at him at the distance of about eight feet, and attempted to fire. It was a percussion lock, and the cap exploded without firing the powder in the barrel. The explosion of the cap was so loud that many persons thought the foot of the steps far from the place, and a great crowd between. Instantly the person dropped the pistol that had missed fire, took another which he held ready cocked in the left hand, concealed by a cloak, levelled it, and pulled the trigger. It was also a percussion lock, and the cap exploded without firing the powder in the barrel. The president instantly rushed upon him with his uplifted cane, and the man shrank back. Mr. Woodbury aimed a blow at him. Lieutenant Gedney, of the navy, knocked him down, and he was secured by the bystanders, who delivered him to the officers of justice for judicial examination. The examination took place before the Chief Justice of the District, Mr. Cranch, by whom he was commited in default of bail. His name was ascertained to be Richard Lawrence, an Englishman by birth, and house painter by trade, at that time out of employment, melancholy and irascible. The pistols were examined and found to be well loaded, and fired afterward without fail, carrying the bullets true and driving them through inch boards at thirty feet distance, nor could any reason be found for the two failures at the rotunda. On his examination, the prisoner seemed to be at his ease, as if unconscious of having done anything wrong, refusing to cross-examine the witnesses who testified against him, or to give any explanation of his conduct. An idea of an unsound mind strongly impressing itself upon the public opinion, the marshal of the District invited two of the most respestable physicians of the city (Dr. Coussin and Dr. Thomas Sewell) to visit him and examine into his mental condition. They did so, and the following was contained in the elaborate report of the result of their examination:

"He (the prisoner) futher stated that, believing the president to be the source of all his difficulties, he was still fixed in his purpose to kill him, and if his successor pursued the same course to put him out of the way also, and declared that no power in the country could punish him for having done so, because it would be resisted by the powers of Europe, as well as of this country. He also stated that he had been long in correspondence with the powers of Europe, and that his family had been wrongfully deprived of the crown of England, and that he should yet live to regain it, and that he considered the president of the United States nothing more than his clerk. The young man appears perfectly tranquil and unconcerned as to the final result, and seems to anticipate no punishment for what he has done."

Another section of the report in referring to the grievance of the young man, says that he visited the president's house about one week previous to the attempt, and stated to the president that he wanted money to take him to England, and the president remarked that he was too much engaged to talk to him, and that he must call another time. The young man insisted that he must have a check on the bank, and when asked what bank, said the bank of the United States. He also stated that he met Mr. VanBuren, and upon that gentleman refusing him money, had told him that either he (Mr. VanBuren) or General Jackson must fall.

A THEORY FOR THE PRESENT CASE.

Senator Benton in conclusion says:

"It is clearly to be seen from this medical examination of the man that his attempted assassination of the president was one of those cases of which history presents many instances, a diseased mind acted upon by a general outcry against a public man. Lawrence was in a particular condition to be acted upon by what he heard against General Jackson—a workman out of employment—needy—idle—mentally morbid; and with reason enough to argue regularly from false premises. He heard the president accused of breaking up the labor of the country, and believed it—of making money scarce, and believe it—of being a tyrant, and believed it—of being an obstacle to all relief, and believed it. And coming to a regular conclusion from all these beliefs, he attempted to do what he believed the state of things required him to do—that the life of the man whom he considered the sole cause of his own and general calamity—and the sole obstacle to his own and general happiness. Hallucination of mind was evident; and the wretched victim of a dreadful delusion was afterward treated as insane, and never brought to trial. But the circumstance made a deep impression upon the public feeling and irresistibly carried many minds to a belief in a superintending providence manifested in the extraordinary circumstance of two pistols in succession—so well loaded, so coolly handled, and which afterward fired with such readiness, force and precision—missing fire each in its turn, when leveled from a distance of eight feet at the president's heart."

Cured of Drinking.

"A young friend of mine was cured of an insatible thirst for liquor, which had so prostrated him that he was unable to do any business. He was entirely cured by the use of Hop Bitters. It allayed all that burning thirst; took away the appetite for liquor; made his nerves steady, and he has remained a sober and steady man for more than two years, and has no desire to return to his cups; I know of a number of others that have been cured of drinking by it."—From a leading R. SAVING MOTHER.

The farmer sat in his easy chair
Between the fire and the lamplight's glare;
His face was ruddy and full and fair.
His three small boys in the chimney nook
Conned the lines of a picture book;
His wife, the pride of his home and heart,
Baked the biscuit and made the tart,
Laid the table and steeped the tea,
Deftly, swiftly, silently;
Tired and weary and weak and faint,
She bore her trials without complaint,
Like many another household saint—
Content, all selfish bliss above,
In the patient ministry of love.
At last, between the clouds of smoke
That wreathed his lips, the husband spoke:

"There's taxes to raise, an' int'rest to pay—
And ef there should come a rainy day,
'Twould be mighty handy, I'm bound to say,
T' have sumpthin' put by. For folks must die,
An' there's funeral bills, and gravestuns to buy—
Enough to swamp a man, purty nigh;
Besides, there's Edward and Dick and Joe
To be provided for when we go.
So'f I was you, I'll tell ye what I'd du:
I'd be savin' of wood as ever I could—
Extra fires don't du any good—
I'd be savin' of soap, and savin' of ile,
And run up some candles once in a while;
I'd be rather sparin' of coffee an' tea,
For sugar is high,
And all to buy,
And cider is good enough for me.
I'd be kind o' careful about my clo'es
And look out sharp how the money goes—
Gewgaws is useless, nater knows;
Extry trimmin'
'S the bane of women.

"I'd sell off the best of the cheese and honey,
And eggs is as good, nigh about, 's the money;
And as to the carpet you wanted now—
I guess we can make the old one do.
And as for the washer an' sewin' machine,
Them smooth-tongued agents, so pesky mean,
You'd better get rid of 'em, slick and clean.
What do they know about women's work?
Do they calkilate woman was born to shirk?

Dick and Edward and little Joe
Sat in the corner in a row.
They saw the patient mother go
On ceaseless errands to and fro;
They saw that her form was bent and thin,
Her temples gray, her cheeks sunk in,
They saw the quiver of lip and chin—
And then with a warmth he could not smother,
Outspoke the youngest, frailest brother:

"You talk of savin' wood and ile
An' tea an' sugar, all the while,
But you never talk of savin' mother!"

JOHN WESLEY HARDIN.

The Career of a Man Who Did not Value Life in the Least.

[Philadelphia Times]

A few years ago, when I was in the cattle business, I started out of the little town of Cuero, Texas, on my return to San Antonio. Cuero was and is still a sort of headquarters for the cowboys, and it has been the scene of some of the bloodiest encounters ever witnessed. It was there that two factions frequently met in the wretched dirty streets, and the minute they caught sight of each other they always began popping away with rifle or revolver.

The most desperate villain connected with this crowd was John Wesley Hardin, the son a preacher, and a fellow who, to my certain knowledge, has killed more than a dozen men.

There was a good deal of drinking and carousing in the town, and I hurried through my business, mounted my mustang and struck off at an easy gallop for San Antonio. Only a little way out I drew up at the roadside and went into one of those miserable little Texas inns to get something to eat. I had scarcely seated myself at the table when a small, bright-eyed fellow came in, set his gun behind the door and sat down on the other side of the table. We nodded familiarly to each other, exchanged a few words and passed such food as we needed, we being the only two in the room. He asked me which way I was going, and when I mentioned "Santone," as it is always pronounced in Texas, he said he would accompany me a short distance, but would have to turn off before going far. We paid our bill, mounted our mustang and moved off side by side. As my companion, although uneducated, was quite intelligent, I kept my horse down to a walk so as to converse with him during the short distance we were to be companions.

"You're from the North, ain't you?" he asked.

I replied that I was, but that I had been in Texas several years.

"What do you think of the country?" he asked.

"It has grand possibilities before it," I replied, with considerable earnestness; "its area is so prodigious that it is capable of making a dozen good sized States, and its soil, climate, and natural facilities mark it as the coming empire. But it has its disadvantages also."

"What's them?" asked my companion more eagerly than grammatically.

"Well, one thing is, the need of better government. There is too much outlawry. Texas averages a murder a day, and I have heard the authorities state that there are a full thousand murderers remaining at large within her borders to-day."

"That's too bad," said, he apparently quite struck with my truthful statement.

I concluded I had a native Texan with me and I would give him a little needed advice, or, more properly, information.

"I never saw any place where crime is viewed with such leniency, if not admiration, as in Texas. The greatest glory of a Texan is to boast of being a 'bad man,' and no one is of much account who has not killed some one. All this has got to change before Texas can make any really material progress. The best thing she can do just now is to hang her Longleys, her Thompsons and John Wesley Hardins"

"Do you know any of those fellows?" interrupted the little horseman beside me.

"No, nor do I wish to excepting that I would like to pull one end of the rope that was to hang them. I feel a special hatred of John Wesley Hardin."

"Why so?"

"Well, he's the son of a preacher, who named him after the great founder of Methodism, and he is the worst sort of a desperado. He hasn't any redeeming features. He is a cowardly murderer, a man who kills in mere wantonness, and I would give five hundred dollars this minute for the privilege of strangling the life out of him. He is a curse to Texas, and there ought to be a reward offered to the first man who will shoot him on sight. The Lone Star State must be purged of such pets before she can thrive."

"That may be so," said my companion quietly, "but all I've got to say, stranger, is that my name is John Wesley Hardin!"

Never until that minute was I prepared to believe that a man's hair actually rises on end when he is "struck" with terror, but when that horseman at my side announced himself as the terrible desperado whom I had been denouncing I distinctly felt my hat slide up my forehead as my hair stiffened and literally stood on end. I was transfixed with fear. For a few seconds I couldn't stir hand nor foot, nor could I speak a word. I never had dreamed that the horseman was anything other than a Texas cowboy, rough but hospitable—one who had probably killed his man, but who was not a dangerous character.

Finally I managed to turn my eyes so as to look at Hardin. He was a little back of me, riding at a leisurely gait, and was looking straight at me, with a peculiar smile on his face—a smile which I was sure meant my death. Hardin had shot down a Sheriff a short time before in cold blood and he thought no more of a human life than he did of brushing away a fly. I was certain he would shoot me dead within the next three minutes. I had my revolver at my hip, but I did not dare attempt to draw, for the instant I moved a hand in that direction he would send a bullet through my brain. In fact I did not dare move at all. I recall that the end of my nose began to itch terribly and yet I was afraid to raise my hand to scratch it, through dread of drawing his fire.

By and by I managed to stammer: "I—beg—your pardon—but—I didn't—know—it was you, Mr Hardin."

"I judge not," he said, with the same horrid grin on his face. "I've only got a word to add. When you're traveling through Texas learn who your pardner is. Don't talk too freely about your betters. Good day sir," and he wheeled off to the right, while I took to the left. I struck my pony into a gallop, but for a moment I was sure Hardin would send a ball from his rifle after me, and when he did that he never failed to "hit hard." No pen can describe my agony of apprehension for a minute or so, but when I glanced furtively over my shoulder the little horseman was riding leisurely along beyond rifle-shot and did not look behind him.

He spared my life that morning merely because the whim happened to take possession of him, for a more heartless desperado and a more deliberate murderer never lived than John Wesley Hardin. He was what might be called the product of the reconstruction days of Texas, when the State was under military rule and when public feeling was such as to develop all the innate deviltry in a man's nature.

When Hardin was yet a boy he began the amusement of shooting negroes. He and one or two reckless companions would visit a picnic, create a disturbance and begin shooting right and left. When they were out of ammunition or the signs were unpropitious they would mount their horses and dash away. Again they would gallop through a company with the object of seeing who could kill the most, with their mustangs in full speed. But shooting of "niggers" became monotonous to Hardin, and he began picking off those of his own race. It would require hours to tell the sanguinary affrays in which he was engaged, and in which he emerged the sole surviver. Some of these, perhaps, were defensible, as he was not always the blamable party, but the majority of them were simply cold-blooded murders.

About five years ago a noted bully below Austin shot a young man on the street one evening while he was promenading with a young lady to whom he was engaged. It was done in pure wantonness, and of course, the fellow was never punished by the law, but a brother of the victim was so infuriated over the deed that he caught up a double-barreled shot-gun and started out for the murderer. Hardin asked him what he intended to do and was told. Hardin laughed, and warned him that it would be sure death for him to attempt any such thing. But the young man would not be dissuaded. He meant to shoot down like a dog the wretch who had done the same to his brother.

"Very well," said Hardin, "I will go along and see fair play."

The young man caught sight of the wretch for whom he was looking on the opposite side of the street, and deliberately raised his gun and took aim. Just as he pulled the trigger the criminal observed him, but too late to escape or get the drop on the boy. The latter pulled trigger and the gun missed fire. The desperado smiled grimly, and drawing up his revolver, said:

"Now, it's my turn; that's just about my distance, and to prevent any accidents, my kid, I won't give you time to say your prayers,"— He had reached that point in his address, when John Wesley Hardin took a hand in the little game and the speaker never completed his sentence, and never will, inasmuch as he dropped dead at the most interesting point, killed by a shot from Hardin's pistol. This was about the best thing Hardin ever did, and yet, when I questioned him about it, he would not admit that he did the killing. The most that he could be got to admit was, "they say I did it," and that was all he would acknowledge concerning any of the innumerable shootings in which he was engaged.

Some time after Hardin met the Sheriff on the street and asked him whether he had a warrant for his arrest. The officer replied that he had not. "Well, I heard you had," said Hardin, "and it's best to be on the safe side," and drawing his pistol in his lightning-like fashion, he shot the officer dead.

This murder was the last feather upon the camel's back. Hardin had been playing the Jim Currie business so long, and unfortunately without the conclusion reached by Currie at Las Vegas, that his last crime roused a strong feeling against him. Additional rewards were offered for his apprehension. As he had committed many similar deeds in Arkansas and Louisiana, the aggregate amount offered for his capture in the three States was $20,000.

The hunt for Hardin became so hot under this extraordinary temptation that he saw the advisability of emigrating, at least until the excitement should blow over. Texas is a big State, but it was too small for him, and it soon became known that he had disappeared. He might have gone into the Indian Nation or beyond the pale of civilization, but no one interested in his capture could form the least idea where to look for him. But the munificent reward awaiting the man who should deliver Hardin to the authorities incited the best men to engage in the hunt.

One of these was a member of Lieutenant Hall's Rangers, as they are called. Texas, as may not generally be known, is provided with a hundred brave and tried men, who constitute what may be called her mounted police. They are under the command of Lieutenant Hall, and roam the State from one end to the other of the settled portion, hunting horse-thieves, murderers and all criminals that are wanted by the authorities. Lieutenant Hall is a prepossessing young man, of sandy complexion, and a splendid rifle-shot. All his men have been tried in the fire, and can be relied on. It was one of these that determined to capture Hardin, and who went about it in the only fashion that promised success. He went off beyond Austin, where the father of young Hardin was running a small ranche, and giving out that he was hunting for similar property in the same neighborhood, finally bought the one immediately adjoining that of the retired preacher. This done, the officer, as a pretended cattle-raiser, stocked it and went to work.

Month after month he conducted himself in the regulation way and gradually became quite intimate with the old gentleman. After the day's toil was over they would sit together in front of one of the houses, smoking their pipes and talking about everything that came into their minds, with the exception that John Wesley was never alluded to by either. They spent hours in this fashion, and at other times would gather in the village store near by, which answered as the post office, where they would join in gossip and discussion while smoking their pipes—in the manner so popular all through our country.

The months passed in this fashion, and the summer was pretty well gone, when one day the elder Hardin took a letter to the office to mail. It was in a crumpled, yellow envelope, and directed in a scrawling hand. The detective walked to the store with Hardin, who carried the letter in his pocket, and he made up his mind that it was intended for his son, John Wesley. This was the very clue for which the officer had been waiting all these months, and this was the first time he had seen the reverend gentleman take a letter to the office. It was necessary to see the directions upon the missive, and not only that, but he must be sure that the discovery is made without attracting the slightest suspicion to himself. He saw no chance to do either while on the road.

Within the office, the Rev. Mr. Hardin brought a three-cent stamp, solemnly licked it and then pounded it upside down on one corner of the soiled envelope with his horny fist, and finally passed it over to the village postmaster. While he was engaged in this deliberate proceeding the detective approached the counter and asked the postmaster for a newspaper. The official turned to look for it. The instant his face was averted the officer glanced over the shoulder of Hardin and read the superscription on the envelope. He saw that it was directed to a Mr. Samuel Jones, of whom he had never heard, and whose postoffice address was a remote town in Florida. It made no difference. The detective was convinced he had discovered the whereabouts of John Wesley Hardin, for whose capture such a large reward was waiting.

The conversation went on as usual through the evening. The same parties congregated after night, and the detective and the Rev. Mr. Hardin met and smoked their pipes as before, while the weeks and months passed by. Finally Mr. Hardin's neighbor said he guessed he would take a run up to Austin to see about selling some of his cattle. Accordingly he bade his friend good-by for several days, mounted his mustang and galloped off. He never stopped traveling—dispensing with his horse as soon as possible—until he reached a certain remote town in Florida, where, gotten up as an ordinary every-day laborer, he took a little tramp through the surrounding country. He was fortunate enough that day to catch sight of the mythical personage at work in the field of a farmer. One searching glance was enough. The high, broad cheek-bones, the small, piggy eyes, the beardless face and slight muscular figure belonged to John Wesley Hardin and no one else. That young man walking about was a moving treasure-box of $20,000, waiting for some one to come and turn the key and walk off with the contents. Did the officer do it? Not by any means. He simply took the one all-sufficient glance and passed by and out of sight. He would no more have ventured over the fence into the field to to arrest the desperado than he would have attempted to put a bit in the mouth of a raging Bengal tiger.

In a desultory talk with the station agent, who was also the telegraphist near by, the officer learned that Sam Jones was accustomed once or twice a week to take the cars and ride to a station about twelve miles above, where he was paying his addresses to some lady. The officer made an arrangement by which the agent agreed to telegraph him at the upper station whenever the mythical Sam Jones should board the train. Of course the agent could be trusted to keep the secret, as that was a part of his business, though he was far from suspecting the importance of the case. Having done all he could, the detective took the cars to the station above, where he spent several days in lounging about and smoking bad cigars while waiting for the dispatch. At the end of three days it came.

"Jones has just boarded the train; sits in last car: man with him; nobody else in the car.

"Agent."

The officer had just enough time in which to complete his arrangements. It was a warm, sultry day, even for that season, and as the little locomotive came wheezing into the depot, with two rickety cars behind it, there were five passengers waiting at the depot apparently to get on board, but as the cars slowed up one of these men, with a Winchester rifle at full cock, stationed himself near the side window, assuming such a position that neither of the two young men, who sat in their shirt sleeves, noticed him.

The next minute two other men, fully armed, boarded the rear platform and entered the door; at the same instant the detective and a friend entered the front door and moved carelessly down the aisle in the direction of the two passengers. The latter glanced up sharply, but saw nothing to cause misgiving, and continued talking. The next moment the officer reached a point in the aisle directly opposite the couple. Stopping suddenly, he exclaimed:

"How are you, John Wesley Hardin?"

As quick as lightning the desperado threw his hand back to his hip to draw his revolver. As he did so one of those behind him grasped his arm and the fight began. The two strong men precipitated themselves upon Hardin, who, though disarmed, fought like a wild cat. They got him down in the aisle, where they finally overpowered and put the nippers on him. While they were doing this the other two officers were engaged in a deadly struggle with the other desperado, who showed an overweening ambition to mingle in the business. The only way convenient to dissuade him was to shoot him dead, which was done. All this time the other friend held his position on the outside with his cocked Winchester, rather more than willing to fire if only a suitable pretext should present itself.

Hardin was taken back to Texas, tried, found guilty and sentenced to twenty-five years' imprisonment. He is now in the State Penitentiary at Austin, where I saw him three years ago. He told me he was suffering from a wound in his side, but is not without hope that he will be pardoned by the Governor after serving a few more years. Judging from the fashion in Texas, this hope is likely to be gratified, though the crimes he has committed could not be expiated by a dozen such worthless lives as his.

A Forest Scene Beside the Amazon.

On the third evening after our departure from Bogota we encamped on the banks of the Rio Patamayo (a tributary of the Amazon), in a group of majestic adansonias, or monkey fig trees. High over our heads we heard an incessant grunting and chattering, but the evening was too far advanced for us to distinguish the little creatures that moved in the top branches of the tall trees. The next morning, however, the noise recommenced, and we saw that the grunters were a sort of small raccoons, and the chatterers a troop of monos, or capuchin monkeys.

After a consultation with the Indians we fastened our monkey, Billy, to a string and made him go up the tree as high as we could drive him without betraying our presence to his relatives. We had no traps for catching them, but our plan was to let them come near enough for us to shoot one of the mothers without hurting her babies. Billy's rope, as we had expected, got entangled before long, and, finding himself at the end of his tether, he began to squeal, and his cries soon attracted the attention of his friends in the tree top. We heard a rustling in the branches, and presently an old ring-tail made his appearance, and, seeing a stranger, his chattering at once brought down a troop of his companions, mostly old males, though. Mother monkeys with babies are very shy, and those in the tree top seemed to have some idea that all was not right.

Their husbands, though, came nearer and nearer, and had almost reached Billy's perch, when all at once their leader slipped behind the tree like a dodging squirrel, and at the same moment we heard from above a fierce, long-drawn scream; a harpy eagle was circling round the tree top, and, coming down with a sudden swoop, he seized one luckless mother monkey that had not found time to reach a hiding place. The poor thing held on to her branch with all her might, knowing that her life and her baby's were at stake, but the eagle caught her by the throat, and his throttling clutch at last made her relax her grip, and, with a single flop of his mighty wings, the harpy raised himself some twenty feet, mother, baby and all. Then we witnessed a most curious instance of maternal devotion and animal instinct—unless I should call it presence of mind; when branch after branch slipped from her grip and all hope was over, the mother with her own hands tore her baby from her neck and flung it down into the tree, rather than to have it share the fate she knew to be in store for herself. I stood up and fired both barrels of my gun after the robber, but without effect; the rascal had already ascended to a height of at least 200 feet, and he flew off with his victim dangling between his claws.—Dr. F. L. Oswald, in St. Nicholas.

He Was for the Man.

A transcript of the evidence in a "woman case" which was appealed to the Supreme Court of Indiana from a county near by contains the following paragraphs. It seems the woman was giving her testimony, and the clerk thus records it:

Question—"Was the defendant present at the time?"

Answer—"No." Here the witness began to sob and cry bitterly.

Question—"Did you see him about that time?"

Answer—"No." Here the witness threw herself down on the floor, yelled, bellowed and walloped herself around until she had to be carried out of the room. When the Judges read this transcript it is said one of them remarked: "If that clerk wants to see a woman wallop herself around and raise the ceiling off the house he ought to catch a sight of my wife when she is in one of her tantrums. Gentlemen, I'm not fit to pass on this case. I'm for the man, up and down, in spite of the devil."—Inter Ocean.

The Horse's Friend.

Even a horse may find it advantageous to have "a friend at court." A market gardener noticed that a basket in which was placed fresh carrots was frequently emptied. He asked the gardener, who said that he could not understand it, but would watch for the thief.

A quarter of an hour had elapsed when the dog was seen to go to the basket, take out a carrot and carry it to the stable.

Dogs do not eat raw carrots, so further inquiry was necessary.

The observers now found that the dog had business with a horse, his night companion; with wagging tail he offered the latter the fruit of his larceny, and the horse made no difficulty about accepting it.

The scene was repeated until the carrots were all gone. The dog had long made a favorite of this horse. There were two horses in the stable, but the other received no notice, much less carrots!—Advance.

Ice-Yachting on the Hudson.

This exciting sport is described and illustrated in Scribner, from which we quote:

"You go on down the river now with a good wind on the beam. The playful breeze freshens in flaws, as if trying to escape you; but still you follow its wayward motions. You start when it starts, flit over the ice with its own speed, turn and glide with the lightness and the grace of its own whirling dance. The ice-yachts darting about look like white-winged swallows skimming over the ice. As they cross and recross your course, you hope that every Captain knows his business and will avoid collisions. The ice-yachts have anticipated your wish, and flown away to various points of the horizon while your thought drew its slow length along. The ice seems to be running under you with great speed, and you sometimes feel that you might easily drop off the open, spider-like frame of the yacht. By such rapid motion, the bubbles, crystals and lines of the ice are all woven into a silky web of prismatic hues. You distinguish only the cracks that run with the course, and, when they deviate from it, they seem to jump from side to side without connecting angles or curves. The mounds and the windrows seem to come up at you suddenly, and dodge past. You begin to hold on to the hand-rail, and lie close down in the box. If you are steering, you feel that your hand is the hand of fate; and the keen excitement nerves you to extraordinary alertness. The breeze sings in the rigging; the runners hum on the ice with a crunching sound, and a slight ringing and crackling; and a little spurt of crushed ice flies up behind each runner and flashes like a spray of gems. The yacht seems more and more a thing of the air—her motions are so fitful, wayward and sudden. The speed with which you approach a distant scene makes it grow distinct while you wink with wonder. Things grow larger, as if under the illusions of magic; you feel the perspective almost as a sensation. You turn toward a brown patch of woods; it quickly assumes the form of headlands; these are pushed apart, and a gorge appears between them; while you stare, a stream starts down the rocks, behind the trees; a mill suddenly grows up; the rocks are now all coated with ice; statues of winter's sculpture are modeled before your eyes, and decked with flashing crystals just as you turn away to some other point of the horizon. So you seem to be continually arriving at distant places.

"A regatta is to be sailed over this course, and you arrive in time to see the start. The yachts all stand in a row, head to the wind. At the word, the first in the line swings stern around till her sails fill; she moves off at once, and the crew jump aboard—one man standing or lying on the windward runner-plank and holding on to the shrouds, and the helmsman and another man lying in the box. Then the other yachts successively swing around; and, in a moment, the whole fleet is under way, gliding in zig-zag courses among the windrows and mounds. They all diminish in apparent size with astonishing rapidity; they seem actually to contract in a moment to a mere white speck, skimming about the river miles away. You join the crowd of men and boys stamping and slapping to keep warm; you exchange a few words with a friend, and, when you turn around again, behold the yachts sweeping down upon you! They grow as they come, flying at you with a wayward, erratic course, and you feel the wonder of embodied speed. The ten-mile race of the ice-yachts is lost and won in as many minutes. But for those who sailed it these minutes were filled with more excitement than is found in many a long lifetime."

Gough and the State Prison Convict.

In my own experience, I have found among those who seemed the most reckless and hardened some spot in the heart that was vulnerable, some chord that can be touched. Once while speaking to the convicts in one of the State prisons, a man sat before me with a face almost demoniac in its expression; it was a face that repelled and yet attracted me; it was what some one has called the "attraction of repulsion." As he fixed his eye on me, cold and steely, with the cynical curl of the lips and a sneer, he almost fascinated me, and I thought of Coleridge's lines in the "Ancient Mariner,"—

"He held him with his glittering eye."

My wonder was, Who can he be? Evidently a man of large brain, of more than average intelligence; and while he fascinated, he embarrassed me. The thoughts that flashed through my mind while I was speaking were, "I can not move this man, my words fall on him like soft snow on a rock. I wish he would not look on me." I became almost confused, and saw a smile pass over his face—a half-contemptuous smile—as if he were conscious of the power he possessed. Seemingly, by concentrating all his powers of will, he had almost gained control of me. I turned from him with an effort, and said: "There may be some before me who think they are hardened, are past feeling; God only knows whether they are or not; but often we cultivate that hardness, when the world turns against us. There may be some here who had a good mother; and even here, when alone in your cell, in the silence of the night, you remember that mother, and the little prayer she taught you as you knelt at her side, and her gentle, loving hand rested on your head. You almost hear the words whispered in your ear; and no human eye seeing you, the tears come, and you are melted into tenderness; but in the morning you harden yourself again into recklessness." I said something like this, steadily keeping my face turned from the man, when I was interrupted by so bitter a cry—"Oh, my God!"—that I turned, and the man, who had risen to utter the exclamation, had sunk in his seat and was audibly sobbing. I was told by one of the officers of the prison that he was one of the hardest cases, the most repelling, the most oblivious to kindness of any man that he had ever come under his supervision. The remembrance of a mother whose heart he may have broken melted the strong man, and he became as a little child.

IT was Artemus Ward who said there were two things in this world no one was ever prepared for—twins.

Newport Amusements.

"The amusements of Newport, in the season, are many and various. First and foremost should be named the Casino, a new feature, but already a most important one. This charming place, which is both like and unlike the conversation halls which, in Europe, bear the same name, is built on the avenue not far from the Ocean House. Its aspect from the street is that of a low, picturesque façade, two stories in height, in the old English style, of brick and olive-painted wood, quaintly shingled and oddly carved, with wide casement windows, and here and there a touch of gilding. A single year has toned its color down to a delightful oldness, which would do no discredit to a street in Chester or Coventry. A broad entrance-hall in the middle of the building leads to an inner quadrangle, turfed and set with flower-beds, in the midst of which rises a splashing fountain. Above and below, on the street side of this quadrangle, are club-rooms and offices, broken by a picturesque clock-tower. To right and left are more club-rooms, a restaurant, reading, dining and smoking rooms; dressing-rooms for ladies and gentlemen; smaller saloons, where entertainments may be given; and kitchens, wisely ordered on the second floors, where their noise and smells can annoy no one. The fourth side of the quadrangle is filled with a double curve of roofed galleries, two stories in height, where ladies sit the morning long, work in hand, chatting with their friends, enjoying the smell of the spray-freshened flowers and listening to the music of the band. Beyond this first quadrangle lies another and wider one, edged with trees and shrubberies, past which winds the carriage-drive from an entrance at the back. The lawn is devoted to open-air tennis. At its far end is another long building, in which are racket-courts, bowling-alleys and a beautiful ball-room, fitted up with a stage and all appurtenances for private theatricals. It will be seen how many and how various tastes may be served by a building of this sort.

"Polo play, and sitting by to see polo played, are among the other favorite Newport amusements. Still another is to ride or drive to the meets of the Queen's county hunt, which, in the latter part of the season, has a run about twice a week. Foxes are not too plentiful in the island, and there are days when the hounds are forced—faute de mieux—to follow a train of anise-seed, instead of their legitimate scent. But the pace, the jumping, and the chances of broken bones are equally good; and as Reynard does not complain, and no baby, in act of being soothed of its infant ailment by the mild infusion which does duty as scent, has as yet fallen a prey to the mistaken ferocity of the pack, there seems no reason to cavil. Ladies often join in the sport.

"The Fort music is another weekly pleasure, involving as it does the pretty drive round the southernmost curve of the bay, with the villa-crowned slopes of Halidon hill on one hand, and on the other the wide outlook of blue water, broken by many islands. Close by is the tiny rock with its time-washed lighthouse, where dwells the brave Ida Lewis, heroine of so much daring adventure, and beyond stretches the long point of Brenton's reef, surmounted by the casemates and smooth glacis of Fort Adams. In the deep point of the inner cove lie the wrecks of two ships, one of them an abandoned slaver, drifted many years since into this quiet harbor, and gradually breaking to pieces under the slow, untiring touches of wind and tide. Only the ribs now remain; they lie, black, skeleton-like shapes, reflected in the tranquil waters of the cove—a perpetual pleasure to such artist eyes as take pleasure in contrast and happy accidents.

"Beside the fashionable Bellevue avenue, and the celebrated ocean drive, which for nine miles follows the sinuosities of the shore from Bailey's beach to Brenton's cove, there are others less famous, but no less enjoyable; the drive over the two beaches, for example, and out to the long end of Sachuest point, through gaps in stone-walls and across fields of grain, by overgrown tracks, where wild flowers and tall, nodding grass half bury the wheels; or the drives to Coddington cove, to the Glen, to Lawton's valley, or along the shore of the eastern passage. The inland drives afford constant characteristic glimpses."

An Ancient Aqueduct Reopened.

After a breach of 1,600 years the aqueduct built by the Emperor Augustus to supply Bologna with water has been restored to use. Nineteen hundred years ago the imperial engineers tapped the Setta near its junction with the Reno, about eleven miles from Bologna, and brought its water to the city through an underground passage. They followed the course of the Reno, tunneling the hills, sinking their work beneath the beds of the precipitous torrents which rush from the mountains into the river, and bringing the waters to the gates of the city, where they were divided, one portion going to supply the public baths, and the other probably destined for the fountains of streets and public squares.

The work of tunneling and the masonry were so thoroughly well done that both stonework and brickwork are still as solid as the rock itself, the only considerable breaks being where the turbulent Reno had washed away with its clayey banks several portions of the aqueduct, or where the headlong torrents which rush down into its stream had excavated their own beds and carried away the artificial substructure.

The restoration of this important work is due chiefly to Count Gozzadini, who caused an accurate survey of the aqueduct to be made about twenty years ago, and in 1864 published the results of the investigation in an elaborate memoir. Since then the work of restoration has been going on with a thoroughness and skill calculated to make the new work as enduring as the old. The aqueduct was originally made of brick and stone cemented with lime and volcanic sand, and the unbroken portions remained as hard as granite.

"Decidedly Snappy."

The English language has never been equal to finding a word to express chic. The Americans have now kindly supplied the deficiency by giving us the word "snappy." A dead-and-alive young man is said to have no "snap," whereas a bandbox turned-out young girl, with white teeth, coral lips, pink dimpled cheeks, sunny hair and white, soft hands, is described as "a decidedly snappy maiden."—London Truth.

A Most Remarkable Life.

A correspondent at Honesdale, Pa., sends to the Philadelphia Times the remarkable history of George Avery, whose career is equal to that of Hugo's hero, Jean Valjean. In 1870 Avery, then about twenty-one years of age, was charged with the murder of John Hayes, of Pike County, Pa. He was arrested and an officer detailed to bring him to Milford. Evidence of the murder was reported to be so conclusive that he could not possibly escape hanging. On their way to Milford the officer imbibed freely of liquor and finally got "blind drunk." Avery secured the keys which unlocked his handcuffs and shackles and took them off, putting them in the bottom of the wagon. He took the reins from the stupidly drunken officer's hands and drove to the nearest hotel, where he arrived with the officer in charge at a late hour. He put the drunken man in bed, roused him the next morning, got him in the wagon, drove on to Milford, the county seat of Pike County, when after he had put the officer in bed at a hotel he went up to the jail and delivered himself up to the keeper. He was confined there till September, 1870, when he was tried for murder and to the great surprise of every one acquitted. Immediately after he was discharged by the court he was arrested, charged with burglary, convicted and sent to State's Prison for a year and a half. He served his term, reading law during his confinement. When he left the Eastern Penitentiary he returned home, opened a law office, arrested several citizens who had testified against him when he was on trial for burglary, charging them with perjury, and failing to make out his case was sentenced to pay the costs. He had no money, so he went to to prison again, where he remained till his friends could scrape up enough money to get him out. When finally he became a free man he returned to his old home at Rowlands. From that time forward burglaries were numerous in that section but never could evidence sufficient to convict Avery be obtained. After a while the young man went to Oil City, Pa., and hung out his shingle as a lawyer. Clients were plenty and fees large. Avery was reaping a golden harvest, when he was convicted of forgery and sent to the Western Penitentiary, at Allegheny City, for four years and eleven months. While there he fell in love with the keeper's daughter, and she proposed to assist him to escape, but he refused to leave prison till his time was out. At the end of the term he returned again to Lackawaxen; soon after professed religion, swindled a neighbor out of a $100 and was induced by the neighbor, who enforced his arguments with a shot-gun, to refund the money. He then went to Luzerne County, where he got into difficulty and went to the Eastern Penitentiary again for a short term. Upon being released the last time he went to the mining regions of the West, where he opened a law office and speculated in stocks. He "struck it rich" and cleared over half a million dollars, gave up his stock speculation forever, sent for his fiancee, the prison-keeper's fair daughter, who went West, and they have just been married. Avery is only about thirty-two years of age and writes to friends at Honesdale that he is now an honest, upright man, and that the next time he comes East it will be as a United States Senator from one of the Western States.

Crying Babies.

Why is it that at every public gathering there is invariably a woman with a baby that always cries? The pair were never known to miss any assembly and and the vocal 'selections are of the choicest nature. Music of this kind is not calculated to soothe the average man. On the contrary it excites his wrath and makes him say uncomplimentary things about the baby, and he wishes the woman would take it out. That is something, however, that she doesn't do. She has come to give the crowd a serenade and it is useless to expostulate with her. She thinks she will be able to quiet the dear child and she sits there patting the little one which is yelling at the top of its lungs and making such an infernal din that the speaker can't be heard ten feet from where he is standing. The baby could, in all probability, as well as not have been left at home, but as it was good just before starting, of course it wouldn't raise any racket after it it got into the crowd. No sooner does it get into a place where people are trying to hear, than it sets up a squawk that makes a man's hair stand on end and causes cold chills to play tag up and down his spinal column. The shrieks are heartrending and there is no way of stopping the racket except by carrying it out of hearing, when the little cherub suddenly becomes as quiet as a graveyard. No speaker can deliver an address and be emphatic, with a squalling baby in front of him emitting more noise to the second than a dozen steam whistles. It creates a feeling of uncertainty in his mind and gets him off the theme. The theatre is one of the worst places a woman can take a child. It is intensely annoying to listen to the distressing howls just when one is most deeply interested in the play. The discordant yelps destroy all interest in the drama and engender desperation in the man of the strongest nerves. Much as it is hoped that the custom of packing vociferous children to entertainments may fall into disuse, there is but little probability of the millennium in this regard coming in time to benefit the people of our generation. Give us a rest on the young ones, and the sooner the better.

The average weight of brain in various races is said to be as follows: English and American, 45.7 ounces; French, 44.6 ounces; German, 44.1 ounces; Italian, 44 ounces; North American Indian, 44.4 ounces; Hindoo, 42.1 ounces; Kaffir (African), 45 ounces; Negro, 40.5 ounces; Bushman, 38 ounces, and Malay and Oceania race, 39 to 43.7 ounces. This nice computation may be correct, but it is worth while to remember that the quality of a man's brain is as important as its quantity. "A little farm well tilled," especially if originally fertile, may be more productive than a big plantation naturally sterile and neglected.

A Clergyman's Night Dance.

"I have had," said a well known clergyman, "some very droll experiences. Among the most exciting was the one that I will now relate. A well known merchant was very sick—some thought nigh unto death. He would see no pastor, nor allow any one to speak to him on the subject of religion. One day he mentioned my name, though he was no acquaintance of mine. He named me two or three times. At length his wife asked him if he wanted me to call. He hesitated for some time, and then asked his family to send for me. He added: "Tell him to come right away." I obeyed the summons, was ushered into the sick chamber, and at once recognized the gentleman as one who had been an occasional hearer in my church. He greeted me with great cordiality, and asked that all should leave the room. He wanted to speak to me privately. His wife left with evident reluctance. The man was so weak that he could with difficulty turn in bed. As soon as the door was closed the patient sprung from his bed, turned the key in the lock, seized upon me with the strength of a giant, and said: 'Now we will have a nice dance,' clasping me about the body, and he, in his night shirt, commenced to caper and prance about the room, humming in a low voice: 'I and my Father are one, equal in power and glory.' He kept his pace for an hour, until I was nearly dead from exhaustion and fright. He was a wild maniac. Once I attempted to scream. He seized me by the throat. His eyes flashed fire. He said he would brain me if I was not quiet. Round and round he turned, keeping up the refrain, 'I and my Father are one, equal in power and glory.' Pretending to be pleased, I suggested that he call in some of the family to join us. He caught at the idea. He opened the door to call the household up, and I instantly flew down stairs pursued by the madman. He was arrested, taken to the madhouse, and in twenty-four hours died a raving maniac. I have never since heard these words repeated without being thrown into a cold sweat. I had dance enough that night to last me the balance of my life."

Caught by a Bunch of Oranges.

A gentleman's destiny threw him one day, alone and unprotected, in the immediate vicinity of two artificial oranges attached to a brown chip hat. The scene of this drama was a Broadway omnibus. The oranges, potent to attract and concentrate the attention of the passers by, were powerless to conceal the humiliating fact that their wearer, for some cause or another, was wanting in that most excellent thing in woman, a porte-monnaie. Owing to the absence of this trivial appendage, the brown chip hat might have been ignominiously expelled from the vehicle had not the gentleman, without once removing his eyes from the oranges, gallantly deposited in their behalf five cents in the money box, a process which gained him a charming look of acknowledgment from a pair of bright eyes, peeping from under the brown hat, as well as a drooping wave of recognition from the golden fruit of the Hesperides. Some time afterward the hero of the omnibus adventure found himself on a boat bound for Newport. An unexpected palpitation of the heart caused him to turn as a bonnet brushed past him. On such a point there could be no possible illusion. The oranges again—and an intimate friend of his own providing for them an eligible nook on the deck of the steamboat. A passport to the society of the chip hat one legitimately obtained, such progress ensued in the line of its ultimate subjugation that when the oranges were invited to transform themselves into a wreath of orange blossoms, without a murmur they consented to this retrogressive movement.—The Hour.

Haunted Me.

A workingman says: "Debt, poverty and suffering haunted me for years, caused by a sick family and large bills for doctoring, which did no good. I was completely discouraged, until one year ago, by the advice of my pastor, I procured Hop Bitters and commenced their use, and in one month we were all well, and I want to say to all poor men you can keep your families well a year with Hop Bitters for less than one doctor's visit will cost."—Christian Advocate.

A Lost Lover.

The officers of the Government receive some very amusing letters now and again. General Walker, the Superintendent of the census, received a doleful account the other day of a lost lover. The letter was a bona fide one and was from a lady, an unmarried lady, from one of the Southern States.

She said her lover left her fifteen years ago, taking with him, as a loan from her, a few hundred dollars that her uncle had left her. She gave the name of her lover as also her own, and said her lover might possibly be dead. She had certainly not heard from him since he went away, although she had taken great pains to discover his whereabouts. She had been waiting for the names of the census to be published, but she was getting tired of waiting. Therefore she begged that General Walker would look over the names and tell her where her truant lover could be found, or if he was dead to tell her where he was buried. She inclosed a stamp for a reply. General Walker has not yet had time to go through the fifty millions of names to oblige this faithful woman, but if he does it at all it will be some rainy Sunday when he can't go to church.—Washington Letter.

A Strange Petrifaction.

The remains of a little child which were buried twenty-two years ago were removed in our cemetery and placed by the grave of its father, Meredith Kendrick, a promising lawyer of this place who was killed in the Confederate service. On taking the plate from the top of the metallic coffin, through the glass the child was seen with every feature just as perfect as the day in was put in the grave. In its hand was the little bouquet of flowers which was put there upon its burial day, perfectly preserved. Its cheek was slightly more florid than when buried. The child was not buried until three days after death, and was then brought from Fayetteville to this place for interment.—Atlanta Constitution.

Prejudice Kills.

"Eleven years our daughter suffered on a bed of misery under the care of several of the best (and some of the worst) physicians, who gave her disease various names but no relief, and now she is restored to us in good health by as simple a remedy as Hop Bitters, that we had pooh-ed at for two years, before using it. We earnestly hope and pray that no one else will let their sick suffer as we did, on account of prejudice against so good a medicine as Hop Bitters."—The Parents.—Telegram.

Surviving a Terrible Wound.

In the battle of Cedar Mountain, Aug. 9, 1862, Corporal Robert E. Williams, of the Forty-sixth Pennsylvania, was shot through the body with a minie-ball, which struck and fractured a rib, piercing through the liver. The ball carried into the body pieces of the blouse and fragments of the rib. He remained on the field, exposed to great heat and a heavy thunder-storm, unattended, and but once refreshed with water by a passing Confederate, until the next evening, when the Union wounded were recovered under a flag of truce. Capt. Joseph Marchette and Corporal Daniel Davis removed Mr. Williams from the field, and found him in a terrible condition, with two large wounds over an inch in diameter, from which already crawled maggots, death being but a few hours distant in the opinion of the surgeons and his friends. He was taken to a hospital at Alexandria, where he remained in a precarious condition for several months, after which he was discharged and returned to Catasauqua, remaining an invalid for a long time, the great trouble arising from the foreign matter carried into the body by the bullet. Periodical sicknesses resulted for several years, when, about five years since, an abscess formed on the abdomen, and Dr. Hornbeck removed from the same a piece of the rib, since which time his disability has not returned, and he is now enjoying good health.—Catasauqua (Pa.) Dispatch.

It is a saying among shoemakers that when one of their trade dies he is transformed into an old gray horse. If the saying is correct we may expect that the German cavalry eventually will be mounted on gray horses almost entirely, for Germany has nearly 400,000 shoemakers, or nearly ninety to every 10,000 of her population.

RESCUED FROM DEATH.

William J. Coughlin, of Somerville, Mass., says: In the fall of 1876 I was taken with bleeding of the lungs, followed by a severe cough. I lost my appetite and flesh, and was confined to my bed. In 1877 I was admitted to the hospital. The doctors said I had a hole in my lung as big as a half dollar. At one time a report went around that I was dead. I gave up hope, but a friend told me of Dr. William Hall's Balsam for the Lungs. I got a bottle, when, to my surprise, I commenced to feel better, and to-day I feel better than for three years past. I write this hoping every one afflicted with diseased lungs will take Dr. William Hall's Balsam, and be convinced that consumption can be cured. I can positively say it has done more good than all the other medicines I have taken since my sickness.

LATEST reports are, that the president is a little better, although his condition for the past week has been very critical, and he is yet far from being out of danger.

SHARKS are becoming unpleasantly common in the harbor of New York. Several large ones have been caught there lately.

THE slave trade in the interior of Africa is very active. The slaves are taken to the nearest posts on the Red Sea, and sold to the turks and Egyptians.

THE old canal bed at Evansville has been sold to a railroad, which is going to run into that city. This gives the road a line into the heart of the city, with no further expense of buying the right of way.

A MAN who was assisting to build a wharf in Detroit was killed last week while holding one of the piles. The great hammer, by some means got loose and struck him on the head, and killed him instantly.

OVER twenty gold mine claims have been located in Fulton, Hamilton and Saratoga counties, New York recently. It is believed they will pay. A specimen in our possession, shows very plainly the precious metal distributed in small specks all through the rock, which is a very hard species of granite.

LAST week's Lagrange Democrat contains the announcement that Mr. Selwyn A. Brant has associated himself with Mr. Snyder in the publication of that paper. We congratulate Bro. Snyder on this accession to the staff of the Democrat, and wish the new firm unbounded success. Mr. Snyder has in the face of all opposition, and especially in a county strongly republican, founded the Democrat and made it a success. For eighteen months he has worked hard for the success of his paper, and now has the satisfaction of seeing it on a footing that assures its future success.

THERE were, according to statistics in the office of the adjutant general of the United States 2,335,948 officers and men enlisted in the service during the rebellion. Of these 303,504 died or were killed in the service, and 285,545 were discharged for disability. The number of persons on the pension list is supposed to be 220,000. The average pension, as shown by the reports for 1880, was $103.34, and the entire sum paid out for pensions by the government during that year was about $22,000,000.

THE Cincinnati Enquirer has the following remarkable item. While it is no doubt true, it will be new to most of our readers:

On the subject of Hygroscopic Qualities of grain, Professor W. H. Brewer, of New Haven, Conn., remarked before the agricultural chemists yesterday that cereals raised in central California while in transit to the coast acquired a sufficient increase of weight by an absorption of moisture to pay for the cost of transportation. He also said that cargoes of grain shipped to Liverpool so increased in weight by this same absorption, the increase alone paid the freightage. This may be in the nature of a revelation to the producer and consumer of breadstuffs.

GUITEAU, the great unhung, had a fracas with one of his guards last week. He seemed in some way to have found out the unusual danger Garfield was in and seemed very uneasy. The guard in going along the hall of the jail looked in and saw Guiteau climbing up at the window, as if trying to get out. The guard went into the room, and made him come down, but noticing something like a knife in his hand, ordered him to give it up. The villain refused to do so, and the guard drew his revolver. A struggle ensued in which the revolver fell to the floor and was discharged. This brought other guards to the scene, when Guiteau was overpowered, and disarmed. It was found that he had in some way got a sort of knife made of the steel shank of a shoe, but he refused to give any explanation regarding his means of getting it, the use he expected to make of it, or his motive in attacking the guard.

IDAHO has a sensation in the shape of a real volcano or something of the sort. The following from Lewiston in that territory explains itself:

A volcanic eruption took place la[illegible] side of the mountain south of the south fork of Clear Water, about twenty miles east of Mount Idaho, on Tuesday, the 17th instant, sending forth a column of fire and smoke several hundred feet in height, and a rock, which fell at a distance of several miles from the place of eruption. The shock was distinctly felt at Mount Idaho, on the extreme west of Camas prairie, and at the mouth of Salmon river, a distance of about seventy-five miles. Later news from Camas prairie reports a column of smoke is issuing from the opening, which is distinctly visible from the prairie. No one as yet has approached the place. Evidences of volcanic action at some former period exist in many places in the immediate vicinity. So far as appears, the opening is less than a thousand feet above the bed of the south fork of Clear Water, and within three miles of Milner Trail, between Mount Idaho and Florence.

Joseph Jackson, of this place, has owned a dog until recently, that had developed an almost human propensity for thieving, having on two occasions taked money from his master's pockets, and succeeded in hiding it without his knowledge. The last time the canine took the pocket-book and hid it in a room in the house, where it was afterward found. Mr. Jackson began to believe the dog was possessed with a too enlightened mind, and put an end to its earthly career, by dispatching it at once.—[Lagrange Standard.

The Reunion.

A BIG TIME AND A LARGE CROWD IN ATTENDANCE.

Butler was literally overflowing with people, but this was about all that could be said of it. The military, and others directly interested, may have been able to see some plan or system in the arrangements, but to the ordinary spectator, all was a mass of chaos and confusion. There was no speaker, except Mr. Hubbell, and while his oration is highly spoken of by those who were so fortunate as to hear him, the great majority of the crowd had come to hear Gen. Gibson, and other distinguished soldiers, and were greatly disappointed. After finding there would be no speaking, the crowd surged back and forth, and finally occupied the field intended for the sham battle. This kept so many from seeing the movements of the men that a part of the crowd left the field and returned to the town. The sham battle was not one of the shining features of the reunion. Even the soldiers term it a fraud, and point the finger of scorn at the managers thereof. After the fight we went to town, in common with the latest spectators. The provisions for feeding the multitude, were indeed most ample. Candy, peanuts, popcorn, red lemonade lunch of all kinds, were supplemented by a number of dance stands. All were well patronized. So too were the saloons, and it is a lamentable fact that more drunken persons were to be seen, than at any similar meeting we have had. How this is accounted for we cannot say, for the authorities seemed to be energetic in their endeavors to preserve order. Several pickpockets were arrested, and one was bound over to court. He is now in jail at this place awaiting his trial; but in spite of the vigilance of the officers, many pockets were picked, and attemps were made to pick many others. No doubt the old soldiers had a very pleasant time. These gatherings are means of giving an opportunity for the "boys in blue" to mingle together once a year and have a good, sociable time. Arrangements should be made, however, to have these gatherings at some town where the great mass of people, who generally attend them, have room enough to turn around. Butler has but one business street, of any importance, and the length of it is about three blocks. Five hundred people would fill this street so full that navigation would be impossible. All came away feeling tired and worn out, yet they all speak in flattering terms of the good time had while there. These two re-unions have drawn such immensely large crowds, that the next one will undoubtedly be larger than either of those in the past.

INCIDENTS:

The smiling faces of C. J. Coats and wife lit up a part of the dense throng as we passed up the street. They seem as happy, as lovers, as we have no doubt they will always be. Cassius has done a most sensible thing, and has secured a wife worthy of him. We wish them all possible success in life. That club of old batchelors is going away fast.

Haskins, the livery man, had the best arrangement on the grounds. He had a large number of stalls put up in a vacant lot near his barn, and in that way ministered to the comfort of many a weary and hard-driven horse.

It was plain they were lovers. They were walking in the middle of the street to avoid the crowd. Then, too, they leaned their shoulders and heads together in the orthodox way. "Billy," said she, as she looked pleadingly into his eyes, "you haven't bought me anything to-day. Won't you buy me something, Billy, an orange or something?" "Bet your life I will," responded Billy in love's low tones, and the twain wended their way over to a peanut stand, and Billy went down into his pocket for the nickel.

That iron cannon was about as effective as a damp firecracker. Just wait 'till the Boys get that twelve pounder.

The new artillery company made a very good appearance, and when they get their other field piece, will be quite an addition to the military force of the county. Let no ruthless invader, &c.

Among those who "did'nt miss their pocket book until after it was gone," are: James Draggoo made a permanent loan of $950.00, at a low rate of interest, to some enterprising sharper. He has plenty of company in his afflictions.—(he can stand it). James Moore $4.50, (he can't stand it); C. G. Smith $5.10, (he's deputy constable and it won't go so hard with him); Jacob Mitchell a $40.00 watch, (he is a lumber dealer and can keep time with his rule); E. S. McDowell and son were knocked down and relieved of what they had left. Next comes Uncle John McClellan. Two of these ruffians collared Uncle John, but when he raised his right arm in the air, and they spied dangling from his fist the shining blade of a fifteen cent dog-knife, they "got up and got." Here is a grand lesson for one and all who may chance, at some future time, to attend a soldier's reunion. John saved his "excheoqer" by the simple twist of the wrist, while others in the dense crowd were yelping, "Police, he's got my pocket book," etc. John kept his presence of mind, and amid the fireing of canons, pistols and guns, that old soldier feeling came back to his "manly breast," and with his little knife he saved his pocket book and its "contents" from the vile hands of the enemy. A thief stuck his hands into Esquire Nimmons' pocket, and was fishing for his pocket book, but Mr. N. discovered this piece of familiarity and caught the scamp by the arm, holding him until help came, when the light-fingered gentleman was marched to the lock-up.

ACCIDENT.

At the preliminary skirmish on Thursday evening, a young man named Thos. Revett, lost his right hand while loading one of the cannons. He was a member of the new artillery company, and was ramming down the cartridge for the second discharge, when owing to some cause, not fully explained, the gun was discharged, blowing his hand to pieces. It was amputated at the wrist joint and he is reported to be doing well. He is a married man and has a small family depending on him for a livelihood.

Around About Us.

T. H. Blair has taken charge of the yards at this place. We are glad to see Mr. B. in the employ of the railroad company again.—[Garrett Herald.

The workmen in the shops at this place will quench their thirst with water from Syracuse lake. A number of barrels, filled with ice, will supply the demand for drinking water.—[Garrett Herald.

Edgerton has been puzzling itself about some post holes that seem to have been mysteriously dug in the night. They probably have some citizens like ours, who would object to digging post holes in the day time.

While a train on the C., I., St. L. & C railroad was passing the farm of Mr. W. B. Lingle, in Benton county, a flax field of one hundred acres was set on fire by sparks from the engine and totally destroyed. The loss will be seven thousand dollars.

J. L. Ferguson, the popular marble dealer of Columbia City, is carving an elegant rustic cross with a woman clinging to it. The cross is standing among rocks and shells at the sea shore. It is an elegant piece of work.—[Churubusco Herald.

The Wabash Courier is responsible for the story of a worthy deacon in that vicinity, who forgot the day of the week, and went to plowing on Sunday. He did not discover his mistake until people were going by to Sunday school.

News reached this place last week of the burning of Mr. John Grant's saw mill, located at Loraine, Richland township. The mill caught fire while the men were at dinner, and was completely destroyed. The loss to Mr. Grant will amount to almost $1,500.—[Columbia City Post.

In the races at Rochester Little Brown Jug won the pacing contest in 2:15.—[Chicago Times.

This is not the first time that the "little brown jug" has won in the race. Indeed, it has always beaten everybody that fooled with it long enough.—[Indianian.

A young man named Ramp, living in Columbia City, was killed last week while working in a saw mill. No one saw the accident, but it would seem that he got caught in the large belt by falling on it. He was badly crushed, and lived but a short time.

The Rome City correspondent of the Banner is firing away at Cedar Beach. Such things are uncalled for. There is room enough in the country for both these watering places, and we are glad to note that the people of Syracuse have the good taste to recognize this, and act accordingly.

The work of tearing down the Eel River railroad shops, at Logansport, and their removal to Butler, DeKalb county, was begun Monday. Some thirty or forty families removed with the shops, and the road bed between Logansport and Denver will be virtually abandoned, as but one train a day each way will be run over that strip of road.—[Wabash Plaindealer.

Rev. E. M. Baker, an old-time friend of ours, and among the oldest settlers of this place, was in town a day or two during the camp meeting and gave us a brief call. We were pleased to learn—as we know all her many friends will be, also—that Mrs. Baker's health is better than it has been for a long time. There are earnest hopes among them that she may fully recover.—[Indianian.

The following we take entire from the Indianian, as it will be of interest to so many of our readers. There is no denying the fact that those beautiful lakes at Syracuse are destined at no distant date, to be the leading summer resort of Northern Indiana:

A number of the officers of the B. & O. railroad spent a day and night here last week inspecting the grounds adjacent to the lake with a view to improving the same. It is proposed to put in a "Y" from the main track to Dillon's Island, where Mr. Welsh, the owner, who is also general freight agent of the road, intends to erect a costly and commodious hotel, and to make the place an attractive and comfortable summer resort. So it seems the long deferred hope of our people is to be realized. It has been the belief here that no substantial improvements would be made until the railroad company took an active interest in the movement and would have some pecuniary interests here that would make them desirous of giving liberal rates to tourists and sporting men. The belief seems to have been well founded for no sooner was it learned that the company had decided to do something, than the air was full of rumors of real estate transfers along the lake shore. The plucky Jones, steamboat proprietor, has purchased a desirable strip of sylvan knolls whereon he is about to build a dining hall for picnic parties, and four summer cottages for families. Other parties talk of building cottages for the convenience of families from Indianapolis. The excursion from Ft. Wayne last Sunday brought about 400 weary pilgrims from the Summit City, and all seemed pleased with the trip.

Slabs from Butler Township.

John Houser is home again.

Dave Heltz and Frank Hess went to Detroit, last Thursday.

Philip Noel put on that uniform, shouldered his musket and went to Butler. He ought to have met a pick-pocket.

Miles Weller's gloomy countenance was a regular visitor at the postoffice for the last three weeks. She was gone to Kosciusko county.

And now is the time that Geo. Quince suddenly recollects he has business at Garrett. It may be to hunt a wagon tire.

The usually quiet little village of Cedar Creek, is at present the scene of several private wars. As to one we can say that we have a nicely managed store, and the senseless attack made upon its owners is urged by people whose jealous nature will permit no good thing.

INNOCENT.

Letters remaining in the postoffice at Auburn, up to Aug. 22, 1881: Mrs. Louisa Beurt, Peter Hosler and Geo. H. Reed.

C. R. Reed is at Decatur, holding a musical institute. He will remain there two or three weeks.

Two sisters of Mrs Capt. Cutter are here on a visit and will remain with Mr. Cutter's folks a few days.

Herman Boozer went to Wabash Monday on business connected with the agricultural implement interest.

Will Dickinson is home from South Bend for a short vacation. He renewed his allegiance to the band, the first thing.

Edgar and Eugene Best and Ernest Stough will go to Ann Arbor to attend school and prepare to take a course in the university.

Haines will sell goods at auction every Saturday. He expects to close out in four or five weeks, and then remove to Manistee, Mich.

Mrs. Hannah Thomas, mother of Mrs. Dr. Chamberlain died Tuesday. Her home is near Newville, at which place she was buried yesterday.

The pickle-loving school girl will have to go pickleless, unless the cucumber vines do their duty a little better than they have so far this summer.

There will be dedication services at the new church in the Shoudel neighborhood, in Smithfield township next Sunday. Bishop Dwenger, of Fort Wayne, will officiate. It will be a large gathering.

Johnny Fisher went to Auburn Saturday, and returned in the evening. Johnny is becoming quite a favorite with the Auburn young people, especially with the young ladies.

Will Patterson, Frank Fisher and a number of other boys went to Turkey lake in Steuben county Tuesday for the purpose of cleaning out the the fish in that body of water.

A Mr. Garwood, of Cassopolis, Mich., a graduate of the university at Ann Arbor, has been visiting the family of Judge McClellan this week. She was 70 years old the day of her death.

Mrs T. Y. Dickinson and her daughter, Hattie, are at present in Orland, where they expect to stay a week or two visiting relatives. This leaves Ned on the list of temporary widowers.

The south bound morning train of the Jackson road stops for freight. It is a nice thing on belated passengers, only sometimes they think they are taking the next train, and get frightened about making connection.

Nearly the whole town went to Butler to the reunion. The rifles always make a good showing, and we notice they are usually on the winning side. Some of our civilians, however, did not succeed as well. They became altogether too warlike, and in attempting to run the town, the tables were turned, and the town ran them—home on an early train.

J. G. Brown, so recently one of our city fathers, now has charge of an extra working gang on the Wabash road at Butler. They are putting in new side tracks along the line of the new road, and several short ones in the town, near the depot. We are glad to see Mr. Brown in the line of promotion. We do not think the company can get a more faithful and efficient man than he is.

THE "NEW STAR" $15 SUIT.

CUSTOM MADE, CUSTOM MADE.

We told you several days ago we had a surprise for you and here it is: 20 different patterns of most beautiful light and dark Cassimeres we have put aside for our $15 suit; and we honestly believe it is several grades higher than any suit in town for the money. We finish them just the same as higher price suits, in trimmings, linings, etc. We might tell you these were English, and sell them at $35, but we WILL tell the truth if we miss a sale; so we say that these are American Cassimeres.

How will they wear? Ah, that is another question, and we can spread ourselves in praising them, for they are good and no mistake. Drop in and see them.

CLOTHING HUMMERS, FORT WAYNE.

Auburn Courier

Local and Miscellaneous.

—Young men with compact cheek will hereafter remember that printing offices were not established to recite incidents which happed during their love voyage down the stream of life. We like to have some of them come occasionally, but when they stay a half day at a time, and keep up a continual conversation with our compositors while here, we constitutionally kick. The benediction is the first thing that should enter their mind when they come into the office.

—The brick firm of Picker, Bumpus & Speck has been "busted higher'n a kite." They have been working at Boann for a couple of weeks, and last Friday they threw up the job, after which a grand matinee was had between Johnny Speck and Billy Hiler, one of the tenders. If the other boys had been away anywhere, there would have been a very small Speck left of Johnny.

—Somebody says that the word woman suggests a person with her sleeves rolled up, and her gown tucked up, and carrying a bucket of soap suds in her hand, and a bunch of clothes pins in her mouth. We don't believe it. We know of several women who never saw soap suds—in a bucket, and they were no more ladies than hundreds who carry clothes-pins in their mouths.

—We have heretofore neglected to mention that Dr. Mercer, of Corunna, has taken back his drug store and will add a complete line of fresh groceries in connection with his drugs. The Dr. is a fine gentleman, and ranks high as a physician and surgeon. It gives us pleasure to note his success, and hope that he will continue to be fortunate in years to come.

—J. J. Van Auken and Geo. Wernts have formed a partnership in the building of bridges, etc. They are both wide-a-wake gentlemen, and there is no question but that they will make business hum. They may beat Jay for sheriff, but when it comes down to shrewd management and good business qualities, "they ain't there."

—Last Friday we saw Doc. Cowan dressed in a suit of black broadcloth and his head crowned in a stove-pipe hat. In his right hand he swung a cane. Our first impression was that there was going to be another grove meeting, but upon inquiry, we learned that he was going to the reunion. Doc. was a soldier boy, you know.

—We stated the other week that Mr. Swineford had erected a platform in front of his hotel for the convenience of loading and unloading trunks, but have since been informed that it was intended to be used as "grand stand for the Auburn Cornet band." A very grand and liberal idea, indeed.

—Several boys from this place, and others from the rural land, made a raid on Dan. Culver's melon patch Sunday last, taking all the fruit both green and ripe. Some of the boys are known and if a satisfactory settlement is not made this week, they will be brought before the bar of justice to answer for their crime.

—Thomas Sprott was noticed tearing up and throwing law books, ink stands, wood-boxes and spittoons out of his office window the other day. After an untiring effort of one hundred and ten men they got him into a straight-jacket long enough for him to tell them that it was a boy. Weight—heavier'n anybody's.

—If it don't make any difference to Hank Wolf we would like to have him bring a bundle of hay along to town and place it in a convenient position for them 'ear mules—it may have a tendency to keep them from braying. Their noise scared a blind man, Monday, so badly that he saw stars.

—J. L. Ferguson, proprietor of the Columbia City marble works, has just erected a monument in the Spencerville cemetery for Mr. John Baltz, over the remains of his deceased daughter. Mr. F. is bringing some fine work into the county, and is establishing a reputation that will soon put him in the front rank.

—The girl at the north end who stuffed the sleeves of an old coat with straw and placed it around her waist as she sat in the window, wrapped in the soft twilight, will make her mark yet. It settled the hash of the neighboring girls, but the satisfaction she derived from the hug was thin—yes, very thin.

—There was a speck of war in front of Hollister's last Saturday. A young man named Harvey Culver claimed that John Stoops owed him fifty-five cents for work. Some words ensued, when young Culver kicked Stoops, and would have attempted further violence but for the interference of by-standers.

—Old James Moore has got the boss horse. He says he beat the train to Butler and back. How wonderful. The horse started at five a. m., and the train at eight—one heat for the "hoss." Returning the animal was let loose at three p. m., and the train at six—two heats for the "hoss."

—Charley Smith was appointed deputy constable. He "raked" in one of the pick-pockets at Butler, and had old John Moore by the collar, but, having no papers, he was obliged to let John go. It cost him five dollars and ten cents to be a police at Butler.

—A fashion item says: "Stockings striped lengthwise are shown for women and children. They make a thin leg look scrawney." Now, we have got to be posted on one of two things. We want to either know what scrawney means, or else what is a thin leg.

—We noticed a poor, miserable looking cur Tuesday, in the south end of town, which, if we are any judge, showed signs of hydrophobia. Every dog ought to be muzzled—or shot. It is immaterial which, just so that the safety of our citizens is assured.

—When the report reached this place that a man had his arm shot off at the reunion, John Leasure got upon Mitch. Houston's butcher shop and tried to look over to Butler. We don't want any one to think that he was excited.

"Give 'Em the Go By."

THE STREET FAKIR IS A PUBLIC NUISANCE.

Last Saturday evening a long haired specimen of some peculiar breed, got upon a pine box, in front of the court square, and sent forth his little, flat speech, which he gives to all who will listen, in each town he visits. He used abusive language to several of our citizens, who, he said, had made remarks concerning him and his long hair. Don't swallow it, boys. This little "send of" of his is given for effect—to draw you on. No one had made any remarks about him, for the simple reason that he was not worth paying any attention to. He told the crowd that newspapers were the biggest liars on earth. They are, eh. His conscience probably allowed him to make this assertion, owing to the fact that he was on a store box. Had he been tramping the dust of mother earth, he wouldn't have said anything about newspapers lying.

—We were shown some samples of Montana wheat this week, by Mr. Guy Plumb, of the First National Bank. The samples were raised by his brother, Byron Plumb, in the valley of the Gallatin, in Montana. There are three varieties, all of kinds not grown here, but did not learn their names. The heads are large and well filled, and if we take them as specimens of what Montana can do in the way of raising wheat, the conclusion must surely be that Montana will eventually take a leading place as a wheat growing country. It will pay our farmers to see these specimens, which are now on exhibition at this office.

—It will be remembered what trouble and inconvenience we had last winter to procure coal enough to supply our actual demand. It is not a bad time now to spur up the old recollections of last winter's sad experience. Upon inquiry we learn that coal can be had and delivered at this place for about $5.00 a ton, and now, before the railroad cars are all engaged in hauling grain, stock, etc., it would be a good time for our citizens to club together and get several car-loads. Our advice would be, however, to dispose of the coal stoves for old iron, and supply the vacancy with wood stoves.

—The Presbyterian social last week was a grand affair. After the guests had eaten ice-cream and cake, they repaired to the upper room, where several of our citizens and Miss Carry Graves, of Fort Wayne, entertained them with recitations, songs, etc. Morris Widney and several others also "spoke their piece," which added greatly to the amusement of the social.

—While Mrs. Frank Beard was driving to town last Saturday, one of the front wheels of her phaeton became heated and locked itself. It was no easy matter for the blacksmith to remove the wheel, first pulling out the boxing, and then using a heavy hammer to get the boxing from the spindle.

—A young looking woman, apparently strong and in good health, was begging upon the streets and at private houses Saturday last. She looked lively, and muscled enough to do a two weeks' washing and attend a country "hoe-down" in the evening.

—Charley Pommert is now pleasantly located on the first floor of the Hebel building, on Seventh street, and those who want a first-class hair cut or shave, can be accommodated by calling in. Charley and Hod are the best artists in town.

—Rhodenbaugh's horse team ran down Main street Saturday on a goat gallop, thinking to themselves that they were running away. Dr. Myers, astride of Humphrey's bicycle, could have passed them without the least bit of exertion.

—We unintentionally did Doc. Ryan an injustice last week, by stating that he was shoveling dirt on the railroad. It turns out to our pleasure that he is the loudest crowing "rooster" on the dump.

—Isaac Roth has found his horses. We were right about their being entered at the Fort Wayne races, but on account of their "wonderful speed" they were barred out. The fellow who entered them is sick with the measles.

—Two weeks more will finish the work on the Wabash side-track, when the gang of workingmen will go to Churubusco and build a track there, thence to Columbia City, etc., until they reach the terminus of the line.

—The buffalo is fattening fast under the careful care of her keeper. By the time the public hammer is swung over her she will be ready to slaughter. Our butchers could get up a sensation by purchasing the critter.

—We hear it whispered about town that Charley Aufrecht, the handy man at the Cabin, is making preparations to slip his head into the matrimonial noose. "Oh, dot lettle German band!"

—The marshal has engaged Henry Kelling to cut down the weeds along the different streets. While Henry is cutting them down on one street they grow up on the other—guess he's only made two streets this summer.

—We can never tell what is going to happen in this world. The girl who this year is working zephyr dogs on a young man's slippers may next year be working half soles on the old man's pants.

—The fumes arising from the burning of brick at Reynolds' brick-kiln, east of town, caused one of our German citizens to remark: "H—l vas broke loose by that Butler town."

—That young fool who was going to thrash the editor last week, can learn from this article that Dan. does the shoulder work of the establishment—rest of us all too busy.

—I. Cool will build a large brick structure at the corner of Eighth and Jackson streets, to be used as a carriage and blacksmith shop, as soon as the masons can be procured to erect it.

—The Wabash road is showing lots of get-up and enterprise. She will miss the target badly if they do not locate their shops at this place or at the Junction.

—No man ought to complain if the world measures him as he measures others. To measure one with his own yardstick may be hard, but it is fair.

Double Accident.

TWO MEN MEET WITH A MISFORTUNE ON THE WABASH GRADE.

W. Casebeer, brother to Enos. and Dr. Casebeer, was buried alive and resurrected again in a very few minutes last Saturday. He was engaged in shoveling dirt on the new side-track of the Wabash road, and while digging out sand, over which hung a large embankment the weight was so great as to cause it to fall, covering Mr. Casebeer entirely from view. There being a number of workmen close by, of course he was soon relieved from his perilous condition. Zeke. Jones was driving along close to the edge of the grade, and by some "miss slip" of the lines he guided the horses in the wrong direction and up set the wagon, the contents of which fell upon Zeke., badly scarring his face and shoulders.

—Where has Charley Ross(?) gone? Billy Little has a pair of boots made that he ordered. They contain the greater contents of the average country tannery.

—One of our young men has this picture to ponder over and choose: An eighty acre farm on one side, and an "eighty acre girl" on the other. He can have his choice.

—The fair at Ligonier will be held October 12, 13, 14 and 15. That's sensible. Much better than to have two or three fairs on the same week.

—It was Miss Josie Rush, and not Mrs. Dawson, who attended W. E. Rush's store during his sickness. We take it all back, Josie.

—The new Presbyterian preacher was expected to arrive here last week but did not come, consequently there was no service at this temple Sunday.

—Mr. Clock, the fruit tree man, is in town. He ought to be able to make things tick pretty lively in the bush and vine trade.

EDITORS COURIER.—Allow me to show to those who are not acquainted with some of our 'society etiquette,' the manner in which it was exhibited one evening last week: A young man from Ohio had been corresponding with a south Main street girl. A party was given the young man, at his uncle's residence, to further his acquaintance among the young folks residing in sweet Auburn. Accordingly he went to her home and gained the consent of his correspondent to accompany him to the gathering, where music, mirth and fun were to be the leading features. They were wending their way past the postoffice when the twain were confronted by an ex-target man, who stood aghast for a moment, and then beckoned for the girl to "come-ere." After a brief whispering conversation she returned to her fellow No. 1, and addressed him thusly: "That young man you see yonder, is my sweet heart. He loves me morn 'n words can tell, and he emphatically objects to me going with you to the party, consequently I most heartily beg of you to excuse me." She was allowed to go, and was not the least bit mad about it. For she took his wing, and pit-a-pat they tripped along toward her abode, humming together, "Good night, lover, good night!" M.

—Miss Ella Husselman, of this place, who has been visiting friends near Orrville, Ohio, died there about a week ago, of typhoid fever. She was twenty-two years old.

Changed Quarters.

A TONSORIAL ARTIST WHO WILL GET HIS HAIR SHAVED CLOSE.

Our citizens will remember seeing a long, gaunt, "narrow pated" individual moving himself upon the walk in front of Pommert's barber shop, at which place he was employed. Every movement, the cut of his cranium and his general conversation went to show plainly that he was the "worst pill in the box." He stole razors and other small articles of Sim. Pommert, but was made to return them on Monday. In the evening he went through Charley Pommert's shop, taking razors, hair oil, money and anything he could conveniently pocket. Going down the back stairs he went through Sim. Tarney's meat market and relieved the drawer of eight dollars. This checkered lad was becoming more prominent every day among a certain class of our boys and girls. We might dwell right here for some time, advising parents in regard to allowing their daughters to take up with every stranger who strikes the town, but we are certain it would only be a waste of time. He gives his name as Harry Palmer (a darling little cognomen) which, we venture to say, is not his original title. He was overhauled at the Junction Tuesday morning and now rests quietly within the bars of the county jail. He claims to hail from Chicago, but it is more natural to suppose that he came from Michigan City, where he will probably be returned at less than excursion rates.

Second Heat.

THE FIRST NINE AND A PICKED NINE AGAIN IN THE DIAMOND.

Last Saturday the Newville base-ball nine was billed for a game here again, but for some unknown reason they were not on the field when the the time came for calling the game. The Auburn nine was on time, dressed in a neatly fitting suit —a la underclothes—and had their hair cut short, finger-nails trimmed and a two ounce vial of arnica attached to their necks by means of a silk cord and tassel. They had filled their part of the agreement "according to Hoyle," and the Newville boys have a poor record for "game and sand" in the minds of the celebrated Auburn ball nine. However, they had play on the brain and victory on their horns, consequently the "Picked Nine" was again called to the field to get their fingers smashed, chase balls and amuse the First nine. Hi. Weaver wagered a cigar on the Picked nine, more to give them encouragement than anything else, but the First nine "had been thar" before. They kept their tally on a parlor match, while the First nine used the side of a telegraph pole. They all returned to the court square and were given three cheers by our citizens, after which the Auburn band accompanied them to their several homes. The challenge is still on the bulletin board for the "Newville Braves."

On His Roost.

THERE'LL BE NO MORE POCKETS PICKED THERE.

Out of the large number of pick-pockets congregated at Butler during the two days of the re-union, only one of the villains was brought to justice and made suffer for his unlawful crime to his fellow man. He claims to hail from Bryan, Ohio, and gives his name as George Wilson. He was caught by Sheriff Leas, and brought to this place by Constable Charley Smith, who landed him safely within the wires of the county cage. He will be furnished a comfortable couch and plenty of grub until the September term of court convenes, when he will be tried for "guilty or not guilty," under the law whip in the hands of Prosecutor Adams

—Mr. and Mrs. Kane, of New York, are in town forming classes in vocal music. They will introduce a new method of musical notation. Also organize a chorus class for the production of the dramatic cantata of Jepthah. Class will meet at Ensley's hall this evening, at 7½ o'clock. The class in note reading will meet at same hall next Monday at 4 o'clock p. m. Come out and hear this new system explained. First meeting free. Mrs. Kane will give private lessons in voice-culture and solo singing.

—We are constitutionally opposed to small purps—they eat all day and bark all night. They are always where you don't want them, and make the most noise when you want them to be quiet. One shoe and your hat is always in the back yard every morning and puppy just far enough under the wood-shed so that you can't reach him with the clothes-prop.

—Joseph Abright is one of the oldest advertisers in the COURIER, and this fact alone is sufficient for us to recommend him as a practical business man and his goods as reliable, substantial articles. There is no need of our readers going to other towns to purchase watches, clocks and jewelry, as Joe has everything they need, and sells them at fair prices.

—There are some people in town who are in the habit of throwing manure and offal into the streets. They certainly know that they are doing an injury to themselves as well as to the town, and if they have a small fine to pay they can attach the blame to themselves alone.

—Disinfectants should be used freely this month. A little carbolic acid, copperas water judiciously used will frequently save fifty times its cost in doctor bills, and very often save life.

—The friends of Burton Brown gave him a surprise party this week. We were promised a statement of the proceedings, but the copy unfortunately fell into republican hands.

—The Newville ball nine will be here Saturday, sure.

POLITICAL.

THE Republican State Central Committee of Minnesota has issued a call for the State Convention to meet at St. Paul on the 28th of September.

WASHINGTON.

A WASHINGTON telegram says of Guiteau, the assassin: "He has now been confined in jail over five weeks. It is rather a singular fact that no one has ever called upon him at the jail with a friendly purpose, that during his wanderings in this city he never made one friend who now manifests any substantial interest in him; that no letter has been received by Guiteau proffering him counsel or assistance. Such an absolute destitution of friends is something unprecedented even in the case of the meanest criminals. He has never asked to have anybody sent for. Officials at the jail state that Guiteau is a very tractable prisoner. The representations frequently made that he is restless and querulous are not founded on fact. He is more composed now and less nervous than when first taken to jail. He has settled down, the officials say, to await philosophically for the result. At no time since his confinement, it is stated by his attendants, has he shown any manifestation of sorrow or remorse. He shows some anxiety about the President's condition and hopes that he will recover."

WASHINGTON telegrams of the 12th inst. report the President's condition, at that date, as fairly satisfactory. The pulse ruled rather high, but the attending surgeons seemed to view this lightly, and asserted that the patient was steadily improving. Dr. Bliss was slightly poisoned by a cut from one of the knives used in removing the pus from the President's wound. Dr. Blackburn, the Governor of Kentucky, expresses the opinion that Guiteau's bullet was deflected to the spinal column, and that the President will undoubtedly die from his wound.

WASHINGTON telegrams of Aug. 15 state that, owing to a slight gastric difficulty, the President's condition was hardly as favorable as on the few previous days. When in ordinary health the President has occasionally suffered from indigestion, but the present attack is all the more serious as the medical staff are working to supply the lost strength. In spite of sensational articles in the newspapers and the ominous forebodings of impatient critics, his surgeons confidently predict the ultimate recovery of the patient. The high pulsation is, they say, not a dangerous symptom in itself, and is at this time the result of indigestion. There is no intention on the part of the surgeons of endeavoring to extract the bullet. They believe that it is now encysted, and therefore incapable of doing more harm. Before leaving for New York Dr. Hamilton expressed himself in a very hopeful manner, explaining that time will be required to diminish the pus-secreting surface, and that until then a marked improvement cannot reasonably be expected. Said the doctor: "You may assure the public that the President will get well if they will only wait patiently for the result."....According to figures furnished by the Supervising Inspector General of Steam Vessels, there were 268 lives lost of passengers and crews upon merchant steam vessels of the United States during the last fiscal year. Compared with the previous year there has been an increase in the number of lives lost of eighty-three persons.

DISPATCHES from the capital on the 16th inst. say that "yesterday was the most unfavorable day which the President passed since the second day after the shooting. His stomach refused to perform its functions, and nourishment had to be administered by injection. Vomiting and nausea occurred several times during the day. The patient's pulse went at an alarming rate, rising at one time to 130. The physicians were evidently much alarmed, but refused to speak much. The Cabinet officers evinced the greatest anxiety. The streets at the capital were thronged with eager, sorrowful crowds anxious to hear the latest news. Dr. Bliss, who had been uniformly sanguine and hopeful, is quoted as saying last night that if the President's stomach does not improve he will die. It was not apprehended that death would ensue to-day in the event no improvement occurs, but it is evident from the expressions of the physicians that unless the stomach quickly recovers its tone the gravest results in the near future are apprehended. At midnight the President was resting quietly, his pulse had somewhat subsided, and he was free from nausea and vomiting, but there was reason to believe that these symptoms would return if food should be administered."

CROP reports received by the Department of Agriculture give the condition of spring wheat at 81, against 88 last year and 81 in 1879 at the same time. Compared with the crop last year, there is reported a heavy decrease in the States of Iowa and Illinois; a slight decrease in Minnesota, Nebraska and California; while in Wisconsin and all the New England States there is an increase. Reports from Dakota indicate a fair crop, with a large increase in acreage. The condition of tobacco is somewhat lower than at this time last year. The general condition of corn is 77—a very considerable decline since last month, when it stood at 90. In August, 1880, the condition was 98, which, however, was exceptionally high. The Atlantic coast States make a showing somewhat better than the general average, except in South Carolina, where the excessive drought has cut down the figures to 41. Louisiana and Texas are the next lowest of the coast States, from the same cause, reporting 67 and 46 respectively. Tennessee is the lowest of the interior States, its average falling to 53. In the great corn-growing region the highest reports are 95 in Wisconsin and 92 in Nebraska, and the lowest 74, in Kansas.

A WASHINGTON dispatch says that a council with a delegation of Dakota Indians took place at the Interior Department. The object of the consultation was to secure for the Poncas under Standing Bear permanent homes in Dakota on their old reservation or as near it as possible. The Omahas declined to sell any more land, and said they would rather sell to white settlers than Indians. The Winnebagoes gave a like answer, but White Thunder, speaking on behalf of all the Sioux tribes, said the land the Poncas wanted was only a small corner of their reservation, and they would give it to the Poncas and welcome them as a part of their nation, having all the rights and privileges of the Sioux people. Secretary Kirkwood asked how much the Sioux wanted as compensation. This seems to be the final conclusion of the long-drawn-out Ponca controversy.

A PARTY of Americans encamped in Guadaloupe canon, 100 miles from Tombstone, Arizona, near the Mexican line, were attacked by Mexicans and five of the number killed—William Lang, Dick Gray, Jim Crane, Charles Snow and Thomas Clinton. Two others were wounded. The trouble arose from a cattle raid across the Mexican line some months ago, and a counter raid by Mexicans recently. The Mexican raiders were overtaken and the cattle recaptured. The Mexicans who killed Lang and Gray's party are supposed to be some of the defeated raiders. A party of 200 Arizonians has organized to avenge the recent murders, and great fears are entertained for the Americans living on the Mexican side, as a war of retaliation is sure to follow.

PRESIDENT GARFIELD.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 17.

There has been little, if any, improvement in the President's condition since yesterday morning. The fact is, his stomach has completely given out. It rejects even lime-water, and nourishment has to be administered by injection. The pulse continues to beat with alarming rapidity. There is gloom at the capital. The Cabinet officers dread the worst, and the physicians have not felt justified in saying anything which might lead to hope.

A gentleman who has seen the President within a day or two says he was so shocked at his altered appearance that he could scarcely conceal his sense of painful surprise. His emaciated features, his fallen eyes, the skin drawn tightly across his face, told a tale of suffering and weakness that the information doubled out in daily bulletins had not conveyed to our anxious nation.

Ex-Senator Conkling stated to an Associated Press reporter yesterday that he thought the country was passing through the most dangerous crisis in its history, and that the President's death would be one of the most dangerous things which could happen it. He said he did not intend to leave New York should the President grow worse, unless to offer his services to the bereaved family of the President.

Guiteau, the assassin, is reported to be feeling very nervous. The movements of the jail officials and the doubling of the military guards seem to have led him to think that a crisis in the President's condition is approaching, and he has become somewhat excited in consequence. He evidently has a great dread of the wrath of the people, and his attempts to appear unconcerned and to make it appear that he considers that in shooting the President he was doing a commendable act are easily seen through. He wants to be considered insane on certain subjects, but will hardly succeed.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 18.

There was a slight improvement in the President's condition yesterday. He slept well last night, the pulse has shown a steady diminution, and there has been no recurrence of the vomiting. The fears of blood-poisoning have been dismissed. A teaspoonful of beef juice and a few drops of muriatic acid were given twice in the afternoon, and a spice blister put on the stomach. The patient's weight has lessened seventy pounds since the assassination, and his face is represented as haggard and blanched. The physicians have decided not to administer food in the natural way for some time to come. Twenty ounces of nutritive substances are daily injected into the President's system. It appears clear to the medical attendants of the President that his critical condition was caused simply by a form of dyspepsia. While the effort was being made to increase the vitality of the body and fortify it for the exhaustion attending the suffering and constant discharge from the wound, the diet was too rapidly increased and produced the relapse. The discovery of this fact will be productive of beneficial results in the immediate future. More patience will be exercised, and the building up of the system will be slower and surer. Dr. Bliss believes that by the time the President recovers from the gastric attack the wound will be healed. It is already far advanced in the healing stage, and the resumption of the functions of the stomach will be the only thing needed to bring the patient to the long-looked-for convalescence. Mrs. Garfield bears up bravely, and her confidence in her husband's recovery remains unshaken. A citizen of New York, describing himself as in robust health, has offered his blood to save the President by transfusion.

Dr. Baxter, who has been the President's physician for ten years previous to the shooting, says that, although of stalwart physique, Gen. Garfield suffered much during the time he attended him from chronic dyspepsia and a delicate stomach, brought about by his sedentary habits and mental strain. He said that the President was in the habit of eating too rapidly, without proper mastication, and also made a practice of sitting up late at night over his books or in considering public business. These habits had the effect of increasing his dyspeptic condition. Dr. Baxter thinks that the attending surgeons have not given these facts as much attention as the circumstances called for.

Among the vast number of dispatches received at the White House was one of a personal character from Queen Victoria, which was answered by Mrs. Garfield.

Secretary Blaine, who was in Augusta when he first heard the news of the last unfavorable change in the President's condition, returned to Washington yesterday.

Yesterday afternoon, while McGill, employed as a guard in the jail, was passing Guiteau's cell he noticed the occupant employed apparently in paring his nails. McGill approached the cell and asked Guiteau what he was doing. Guiteau said he was doing nothing, and on McGill asking what he was doing with the knife the scoundrel made oath that he had none. The guard called on him to drop it, whereupon the murderous ruffian jumped up and attempted to stab him. McGill pulled his revolver, Guiteau grappled him, and in the struggle the revolver went off. This brought other guards, and Guiteau was secured. The knife, which he swore he had not, was found under his foot. It is made of steel, is five or six inches in length and rather sharp. Guiteau, after being disarmed, raved and affected insanity. How he came in possession of the knife has not been ascertained.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 19.

A stronger pulse, a better feeling of the skin, retention of nourishment derived from enemata, and the excellent tone of the President's mind, are mentioned as unmistakable indications that the crisis is past and the road to recovery again regained. The fact that the President is able to procure refreshing sleep without the use of anodynes is pointed to as one of the most favorable features of his case. The irritation of the stomach has entirely ceased, and it is thought the patient's thirst will be entirely satisfied by supplying him with fluids in the ordinary way and by enemata. The wound is considered in a very healthy condition. Some alarm was created yesterday among the unmedical by the appearance of a swelling of the parotid gland near the right angle of the jaw. This, however, occasions no uneasiness among the professional men, being merely regarded as an indication of a debilitated system, the result of a low tone of the blood, and not figuring in the case one way or another. Agnew informed Mrs. Garfield that the only thing needed for the rapid recovery of the President was the improvement of the digestive power of the stomach.

Warden Crocker, of the Washington jail, yesterday handed Guiteau a postal-card from his sister, Mrs. F. M. Scoville, of Chicago, asking about his health. The assassin requested that she be informed that he was praying daily for the recovery of the President, and regretted his deed.

The Penalty of a Day's Philanthropy.

It's a great thing to be a philanthropist. So Mr. Goodheart thought, and at the suggestion of his neighbor, Mr. Snide, he resolved to have a grand picnic for the poor bootblacks of the city at his elegant country house. So he sent a man to hunt up a lot of the boys and bring them out there one fine afternoon. They came, a good hundred of them, and the old gentlemen received them with smiling faces and kind words. "Make yourselves right at home, boys, and have just as good a time as you know how to," he said to them. Then he left them to go it and went into the house. In about fifteen minutes his head gardener came in and asked him if he had given three of the boys permission to ride upon his Alderney cow, and to throw rocks and hard names at whoever objected. Mr. G. said "No," and went out to see about it. He finally induced the boys to quit that amusement, and then his coachman came and said if he wanted to have any fish in his trout pond he'd better go and stop the boys from fishing in it. He did so and began to feel rather annoyed at their proceedings. But he stood it and didn't scold. Presently his dog flew by with a bottle attached to his tail, and the whole gang set off in pursuit, and ran over his flower beds and into the conservatory and upset valuable plants, and did a heap of damage. Then he ordered the gang started for the city, and in hunting them up four were found to have just got the barn afire by smoking in the hay. Vigorous efforts, however, saved the building and the boys were shipped away. And then Mr. G. sadly told his men to try and repair the wreck while he went over to see the neighbor who suggested the affair. And they parted foes. And Mr. G. declares he is not and never will be a philanthropist. It's harder than being a hero.—Boston Post.

The Unfortunate Position of a Bridegroom.

They had a terrible time at a wedding up at Petaluma the other day, and which only goes to show the smallest drawback will sometimes take the stiffening out of the swellest occasion.

It seems that the ceremony was a very grand affair, indeed. There were eight bridesmaids, and the church was crowded from pit to dome, as the dramatic critics would say. But, when they got to the proper place in the ceremony, and the groom began feeling around for the ring, he discovered that it wasn't on hand. After the minister had scowled at the miserable wretch for awhile the latter detected that the magic circlet had slipped through a hole in his pocket and worked down into his boot. He communicated the terrible fact in a whisper to the bride, who turned deadly pale and was only kept from fainting by the reflection that they would inevitably cut the strings of her satin corset in case she did.

"Why don't you produce the ring?" whispered the bride's big brother, hoarsely, and feeling for his pistol, under the impression that the miserable man was about to back out.

"I can't. It's in my boot," explained the groom, under his breath, his very hair meanwhile turning red with mortification.

"Try and fish it out, somehow—hurry up!" mumbled the preacher behind his book.

"I'll try," gasped the victim, who was very stout; and he put one foot on the chancel rail, pulled up his trousers leg, and began making spasmodic jabs for the ring with his forefinger. The minister motioned to the organist to squeeze out a few notes to fill in the time, while a rumor rapidly went through the congregation to the effect that a telegram had just arrived proving that the groom had four wives living in the East already.

"I—I can't reach it," groaned the half married man, in agony. "It won't come."

"Sit down and take off your boot, you fool!" hissed the bride's mother, while the bride herself moaned piteously and wrung her hands.

There was nothing left; so the sufferer sat down on the floor and began to wrestle with his boot which was naturally new and tight, while a fresh rumor got under way to the effect that the groom was beastly tight and insisted on paring his corns.

As the boot came finally off, its crushed wearer endeavored, unsuccessfully, to hide a trade dollar hole in the heel of his stocking; noticing which the parson, who was a humorous sort of sky-contractor, said, grimly:

"You seem to be getting married just in time, my young friend."

Table Manners.

Nothing is so important in the training of a family of children (after teaching them reverence and to tell the truth), as to give them good table manners, says an article in Harper's Bazar, from which are taken these extracts: It is said by foreigners to be a great national defect with us Americans. We do not, as a nation, comport ourselves well at the table. In the first place, we eat too fast, and are apt to make a noise over our soup. Well-bred people put their soup into their mouths without a sound, lifting up their spoon slowly, thinking about it, and managing to swallow it noiselessly. In the second place, we are accused of chewing our food with the mouth open, and of putting too much in the mouth at once. Again, we are accused, particularly at railway stations and at hotels, of putting our heads in our plates, and of eating with the knife instead of with the fork. Some people eat instinctively and with great elegance; some never achieve elegance in these minor matters, but all should strive for it. There is no more repulsive object than a person who eats noisily, grossly, inelegantly. Dr. Johnson is remembered for his brutal way of eating almost as much as for his great learning and genius. With him it was selfish preoccupation. Fish and fruit are eaten with silver knives and forks; or, if silver fish-knives are not provided, a piece of bread can be held in the left hand. Fish corrodes a steel knife. Never tilt a soup-plate for the last drop, or scrape your plate clean, or drain your wine-glass to the dregs. Leave something for "manners"—a good old rule. A part of table manners should be the conversation. By mutual consent, every one should bring only the best that is in him to the table. There should be the greatest care taken in the family circle to talk of only agreeable topics at meals. The mutual forbearance which prompts the neat dress, the respectful bearing, the delicate habit of eating, the attention to table etiquette, should also make the mind put on its best dress, and the effort of any one at a meal should be to make himself or herself as agreeable as possible. No one should show any haste in being helped, any displeasure at being left until the last. It is always proper at an informal meal to ask for a second cut, to say that rare or underdone beef is more to your taste than the more cooked portions, to ask for another glass of champagne or sherry. But one never asks twice for soup or fish; one is rarely helped twice at dessert. These dishes, also salad, are supposed to admit of but one helping.

THE FAMILY PHYSICIAN.

TO REMOVE DANDRUFF.—This is a natural secretion, but becomes a cutaneous complaint by neglect. Take an ounce of powdered borax, a piece of unslacked lime the size of a chestnut, and a table-spoonful of spirits of ammonia; put them in a quart bottle, and fill it up with boiled or pump water. After twelve hours apply this wash to the scalp. Ladies can apply it best with a small sponge. Rinse with tepid water. After a few applications the scales will disappear, the hair becomes soft and brilliant, and the young hair will be seen to start out. Dandruff should be cured gradually, so as not to produce sick headache or dizziness by its sudden suppression.

THE excessive mortality of infants within the first year has been lately discussed among medical men in Paris. M. Bouchardat contends that the great mass of the milk sold in Paris does not fulfill the conditions indispensable to alimentation of infants; that it does not digest like mother's milk, but produces diarrhea, which is the chief cause of the excessive mortality. He considers that effort should be made to secure maternal suckling (except in very rare cases). M. Jules Guerin, while agreeing as to the prevalence of infantile diarrhea, considers that more attention should be paid to adaptation of cow's milk, and, in artificial lactation, to the digestive powers of the child. He had often observed that infants fed with good cow's milk had diarrhea, because the milk was too strong or given in too great quantity.

BATHING CHILDREN.—Some mothers think when their children get beyond two or three years of age the frequent entire bath can be dispensed with. If some of the main facts of physiology were well known and understood every one would perceive that cleanliness of the skin is one of the conditions of good health. It happens when bathing is disregarded that the lungs, kidneys or bowels have more than their own apportionment of work. If they are strong and healthy they may bear the tax without apparent ill, but, in most cases, a lowering of the vitality and tone of the system ensues. Large bath tubs are convenient and pleasant, but not indispensable for proper cleaning of the skin. A speedy sponging of the body in pure water, followed by friction in pure air, is all that is necessary. When disinclined to use water a thorough application of the flesh brush to the whole person is an excellent substitute; especially on retiring, it relieves nervousness, equalizes the circulation, and induces quiet sleep. Mothers, above all, should see that their children are well bathed. If their skins are kept active and healthy there will not be half the danger from fever, colds and eruptions. If your little one is cross and troublesome, and finds no occupation that pleases him, try the effects of a bath; sometimes it is magical, and if tired he will go to sleep and awake bright, cheerful and happy. Do not, as some people do, plunge a child in cold water when he screams and shrinks from it, thinking you are doing a good deed. Nature must be the guide. If your child has a nervous constitution a shock of this kind is only exhausting and injurious.

"How did you like the lecture?"

"Oh, it was beautiful."

"What did he say?"

"Oh, he said so many beautiful things."

"Tell me some."

"Oh, he said—he said—but I can't tell it to you as he said them."

"Tell them as you understood them."

"Well, he said—he said—oh I can't——."

"Tell us one thing he said."

"Well, he said that the æsthetics of existence enabled us to—to—oh, I can't."

"Tell us what you think he meant."

"Oh, go along. Why didn't you go and hear him yourself?"

IN ENGLAND a first-class telegraph clerk under the present system may, with good luck and good conduct combined, after eighteen years' service, raise himself to a pecuniary pinnacle whereby he would be entitled to a salary of $120 per annum. The wages of a third-class clerk commences at sixteen shillings per week, and rise by gradual increments to the sum of twenty-seven shillings, and yet they are not happy, and, like Oliver Twist, "are asking for more."

Dr. Biddinger, of Harrison county, had several horses die in quick succession, and suspicion attached to Samuel Ewing, a farmer in the neighborhood, as the poisoner. Ewing was then hanged to a tree to extort a confession, and was finally forced to sell out and leave. Chemical analysis now shows that the horses died of botts.

Driven-well owners in Jackson county denounce as a swindle the demand made upon them for $10 royalty for each well. Some, rather than litigate, have acceded to the demand, but the greater majority declare they will spend double the amount in defending any suits that may be brought against them.

As Reuben Baker was leaving Geneva, Adams county, for Fulton county, Ill., he displayed all his wealth, amounting to $140, at the depot, and, before leaving, was robbed of his money by Joel Weaver and Alfred Sharpe. Sharpe has been apprehended, and confessed and delivered to the Justice his half of the money. The other escaped.

A young married man went to Connersville, Fayette county, and purchased furniture to go to housekeeping. On his road home with the goods, he accidentally let fire fall from his cigar into the straw and combustibles. The blaze sprang up fiercely, and it was with difficulty that the horses were extricated from the wagon. The furniture and wagon were consumed.

At Muncie, Delaware county, one of the men connected with a side-show attached to Coup's circus was badly bitten on the hand by one of the snakes. He had his hand in the case for the purpose of learning the temperature, when the reptile very suddenly caught his finger. The man went to a drug store and filled himself with whisky and will survive.

John Shaffer, an old and wealthy farmer, died lately at Delphi, Carroll county. In some respects he was a remarkable man. Without sufficient education to keep a set of books, for years he relied altogether on his memory to keep the transactions of several kinds of business, amounting annually, perhaps, to $20,000, and people always found him to be correct and accurate.

Corry, Clay county, was lately the scene of a homicide, the parties to which were Daniel O. Beatty and Joseph Dunham. Beatty is Dunham's son-in-law, and the two men disagreed as to the proper division of some wheat of which they were joint owners. They met, with their arbitrators, at a school house to settle the matter, when the quarrel was renewed, and Beatty shot his father-in-law dead.

An analysis of the stomach of Sarah Lewellen, whose murder by her husband, William Lewellen, at North Vernon, has been charged, found strychnine in quantities sufficient to have killed half a dozen persons. The husband is in jail, with excellent chances of being the second man hanged in Jennings county. Lewellen's neighbors have believed him guilty from the beginning, and frequent threats of lynching have been heard.

Caressing a Serpent.

Mr. H. T. Poole, well known as one of Polk County's trustworthy citizens, has a little boy near the age of three years, that has been unusually backward about learning to talk, but has acquired the art of endeavoring to be understood by means of signs, such as pointing his finger at such objects as happen to gain his attention. Not long since, while a lady friend was calling upon Mrs. Poole, the child's peculiar actions led his mother to believe that something unusual was receiving his attention, and as soon as her company disappeared she was led to make an investigation. Following the child in the yard and to the corner of the house, she watched the little one stoop low and crawl under the floor, where his attention was soon seemingly drawn to some object well back in the corner of the brick underpinning.

Led now by a deep curiosity, the mother herself crawled beneath the floor sufficiently to acquaint herself with the situation, and the sight that met her gaze almost froze her blood. In a perfect coil, as though prepared to combat some formidable foe, with head erect, lay a huge serpent, with the little child rubbing its hands gently over its body. The serpent, as though apprised of the child's ignorance of fear, and intending no harm, would gently move its head aside when the hand of the child passed near it. Mrs. Poole as quick as possible after realizing this awful situation, drew the child away, and directed some negro women to drag the serpent out and kill it. With a hoe they soon brought it out, but it quickly began to show fight, once jumping its full length at those seeking to slay it. It was dispatched, however, and proved to be of that dangerous specimen known as the highland moccasin. It was more than half as large as a man's wrist, and measured nearly three feet in length.

It is supposed that the child had been fondling the snake for some while, and who, possessing a knowledge of the reptil's dangerous character, will attempt an answer to the query: Why was he spared the poisonous fangs?—Cedarville (Ga.) Advertiser.

A Curious Instance.

A few days ago a most singular case was heard in one of the Paris law courts. A stone mason, named Jean Jeanzac, 30 years of age, was charged with trying to make a prostitute of a young girl, Pauline Vilette, born in 1865. The girl, it seems, had run away from home and went to live with Jeanzac, but when they were arrested both declared that she was as pure as when she was born. In court the girl made a statement which created the greatest sensation. She said it was a voluntary act on her part, going away from home to live with Jean. They had great affection for each other, for he was kind to her when her mother's husband, who was not her father, abused her. They had slept together for weeks, but never had Jean attempted to dishonor her person, and she was still a virgin. In proof of what she said she demanded that medical experts should be sent for and an examination held. The judge sent for two prominent doctors, who pronounced her worthy of the Montyon prize—a reward given yearly by the French academy to the most virtuous girl in France. Of course Jean was acquitted. —Paris Cor. Kansas City Times.

The Curiosities of Politics.

The most marvelous thing about the Republican party is the control which is has obtained over the public sentiment of the North. In 1860 it was fashionable to consider a debased suffrage the great danger of the country, in 1870 manhood suffrage was the first article in the creed of the infallible political party, and whoever denied it was anathematized; in 1880 a broad tolerance was in fashion, and a good Republican might hold either doctrine and defend the enfranchisement of the negro in South Carolina and the disfranchisement of the foreign-born citizen in Rhode Island.

Sometimes it is expedient for Republican purposes that temperance should be the keystone of political reform, and then again it may be denounced as mere fanaticism. In 1868 paper money was a sacred thing, and in 1873 gold was the god of the nation's idolatry. When it is necessary to install a carpet-bag Governor who had been defeated at the polls, a State has no rights which the Federal Government is bound to respect. When it is necessary to count into the Presidency a man who was not chosen by the people, the rights of the States are so sacred that Congress cannot go beyond the official seal on the certificates as to the electors' votes, even to correct fraud and forgery.

Right and wrong, as the needs of the party dictate, seem to become almost inconvertible terms. There are times when it appears to be a greater crime for a Democrat to have red hair than for a Republican to steal $100,000.

In regard to the individuals within the Republican organization, this curious power to alter standards, to make and unmake heroes, is singularly exhibited. The facility with which a commonplace little man like Woodford can be exalted to fame as one of the foremost orators of the world, and cast down again to the level of an incompetent attorney neglecting his official duties, is amusing. We have seen Woodin hooted as the underling of Tweed, and then metamorphosed into a great reformer. We can remember the time when Schuyler Colfax was held up as the model of American manhood, and we are by no means sure that he won't come into fashion again. The moment Seward abandoned Republicanism he sank from the foremost statesman of the age and the associate of Lincoln to a mere drunken office-holder. When Chase turned Democratic, he turned also, in the eyes of the public, into a mere office-seeker. The hate of the party converted Horace Greeley from the champion of human rights into a driveling old pro-slavery idiot.

At present we are enjoying the most astonishing exhibition of the ability of the Republican party to set up and pull down national heroes that was ever exhibited. A little more than a year ago, the country, under the influence of Republican fascination, was crazy about Gen. Grant. As the Chicago Times puts the case, "He was the greatest warrior of the world. He was the first citizen of the republic. He was noble, modest, gracious, the guest of Kings, the lover and savior of his country." Sober-minded people dreaded that the popular folly which treated him as a sort of demigod might prove dangerous to our institutions. Now Gen. Grant is metamorphosed into a dull and stupid fellow with an indecent idea of his own importance. He smokes too much and he has been altogether too fond of liquor. To be sure he won some battles, but then he had able subordinates and no end of odds; and all these campaigns were full of costly blunders. It has been discovered that he went on a spree after Donelson; that he was badly whipped at Shiloh; that he lingered for months about Vicksburg without a plan; that he botched the seige of Richmond; that he tried to prevent Sherman from marching on Savannah; that he wanted to remove Thomas; that he was a wretched President, and consorted with thieves and bosses; and that he is a very disreputable person generally, at whom any political cur may snap.

Verily, a history of the effect of the necessities of the Republican party upon received moral, social and historical standards would be an interesting work. —Buffalo Courier.

More Democratic—Less Monarchical.

So-called Republican journals assert that the true way to reform our Government is to make it less democratic. They propose to get rid of what they are pleased to call the "spoils system," by introducing a permanent civil service. They would give the President a body guard, and make assaults upon his person treason. They would hold him responsible only through his ministers, and they would restrict the liberty of criticism. In short, as Hamilton expressed it, they would "go into the British form."

Our constitution requires no such tinkering. It needs only an honest administration, faithful to the spirit and true to the letter. A good President more devoted to country than to party, or even more devoted to party than to faction, would speedily set to rights all that is amiss. He has law enough ready made on the statute book to institute every desirable reform. Jefferson, coming into place after a high carnival of years, found no difficulty whatever in reducing the Government to perfect simplicity, economy and efficiency, without any special legislation, until he came to the army, when Congress granted all he asked.

If we are to have any changes, let them be in the direction of democracy instead of monarchy. Let us give the people more voice, and not less, in the management of their own affairs. Mr. Henry Clay Dean, of Iowa, insists that the only way to eliminate the evils complained of is to make every officer of the Federal Government, except heads of departments, from President down to Postmaster, elective, and so responsible directly to the people. He would include the judiciary and the Senate. The latter he declares is now a mere refuge for the tools of corruption, and the former has been prostituted to party and to corporate power until it has well nigh lost public respect. What chance under this system would Lapham and Miller have had of an election to the Senate, or Joe Bradley and Stanley Matthews to seats on the Supreme bench?

We commend these views of Mr. Dean to professional reformers. It is curious that all their proposed innovations are against the people. As this one moves in an opposite direction it may be worthy of consideration.—New York Sun.

A Very Needful Invention.

The facts were these: Mr. Skid's neighbor kept a goat and that goat had often got at Mr. Skid and butted him two rods, end over end, and he hated the goat profusely. But the neighbor wouldn't keep the goat shut up, and so Skid invented a machine to slay the goat. It was in the form of a man bending down to pick up his hat, but in the body was a spring of tremendous power. From the hip pocket of the figure waved a red handkerchief that was the target to draw on the goat. When he butted it the spring would fly and throw the goat a big distance. The machine was gotten up in very elaborate style and looked just like a man. It was perfect enough to deceive any goat. And it cost Skid $74. But he didn't begrudge the money so long as it fetched the goat. And he took the machine and put it out in his front yard where the goat could see it, and then he retired to his house and waited to see the fun. He waited about two hours, and then his son came in and told him that the goat had swallowed an old hoop-skirt the night before and it had got tangled in his bowels and slain him. And of course Skid was terribly mad. But the machine was not wholly wasted, for the boy took it and put it on the outside of the circus tent so it looked like a man just starting to crawl under, and a policeman ran up and hit it with his club and was surprised to see his club fly forty feet into the air, while his arm ached like fury, and then a stalwart circus man ran up and kicked the king and was picked up twenty feet away with his leg broken in two places. And when he got over his surprise he said he'd give that man a season ticket if he'd tell how he did it, as he'd like to work the same racket on the old man of the girl he was courting. But the machine couldn't be found, the boy having, in the excitement, taken it home. He is going to sell it to a country editor, to be pointed out as "the man who wrote the article you object to. You can proceed to kick him."—Boston Post.

Fire Department in France.

While Paris is far ahead of cities in the United States in regard to some of her municipal arrangements, in others she is quite deficient. Her streets are cleaned when necessary, as if by magic. Let there be a snowfall, and thousands of men will be out armed with shovels, &c., and in a twinkling the thoroughfares are as free from the unwelcome visitant as if it had never come.

But the fire service is simply execrable. Hand pumps are used, and they will not throw the water with sufficient force to reach the upper stories of the immense buildings there. Some steam pumps are employed but they are never ready and it takes so long before they can be upon the scene of action as to be often of really little service. When the Magazin du Printemps burned it was between two and three hours after the fire broke out before the steam pumps arrived, and then the stream could only be sent into the third story.

It would make the Parisians open their eyes somewhat could they see the celerity with which the firemen in our large cities move. Everything is so perfectly adjusted that almost before the echo of the bell which calls them has died away, the engines, hose carts and ladders are in rapid motion, and unless the fire had got under strong headway before discovered it perishes almost in an instant. The people on both sides of the water could learn something from each other in regard to living.

The winds were whispering low and the sentinel stars had set their watch in the sky as she leaned from her chamber window and tenderly asked: "Is that you, Henry?" "Coursh 'tis; pretty 'oman dozzen know 'er own husband when sh' seezim."

Rather Conservative.

The old maid of the period is usually a rich old maid, and her virtues are of the conservative order.

Such a lady was recently addressed by a widower with seven children who desired to marry her.

"Sir," she said, "I would not live in the house with seven children of my own, much less anybody else's." The widower said:

"You astonish me." And, after a little while, "What am I to do with my seven children?"

"Offer them to some girl in her teens who doesn't know any better," said the maiden lady, and the widower said he believed he would.

There is a true saying that the bunghole of an unthrifty man's barrel is where the spigot ought to be.

PROVED A SUCCESS

THE PASTILLE
Prof. Harris' Radical Cure
Trade Mark
FOR

BY YEARS OF USE!

A valuable Discovery and New Departure in Medical Science. A positively effective Remedy for the speedy and permanent Cure for organic weakness—the deplorable disease resulting from indiscreet practices or excesses in youth or at any time of life—by the only true way, viz: Direct Application acting by Absorption, and exerting its specific influence on the Vesicles, Ducts, and Gland, that are unable to perform their natural functions while this disease pervades the human organism. The use of the Pastille is attended with no pain or inconvenience, and does not interfere with the ordinary pursuits of life; it is quickly dissolved and soon absorbed, producing an immediate soothing and restorative effect upon the nervous organizations wrecked from vicious habits or excesses, stopping the drain from the system, restoring the mind to health and sound memory, removing the Dimness of Sight, Confusion of Ideas, Aversion to Society, etc., etc., and the appearance of premature old age usually accompanying this trouble, and restoring the vital forces, where they have been dormant for years. This mode of treatment has stood the test in very severe cases, and is now a pronounced success. Drugs are too much prescribed in this trouble, and, as many can bear witness to, with but little if any permanent good. There is no nonsense about this Preparation. Practical observation enables us to positively guarantee that it will give satisfaction. It has been in general use for several years and we have thousands of testimonials from patients, as to its value, and it is now conceded to be the most rational means yet discovered for reaching and curing this very prevalent trouble, that is well known to be the cause of untold misery to so many, and upon whom quacks prey with their useless nostrums and big fees. The Remedy is put up in neat boxes of three sizes. No. 1 (enough to last a month), $3; No. 2, (sufficient to effect a permanent cure, unless in severe cases), $5; No. 3, (lasting over three months, will restore those in the worst condition,) $7. Sent by mail, in plain wrappers. Full DIRECTIONS for using will accompany EACH BOX.

Send for Sealed Descriptive Pamphlets giving Anatomical Illustrations and Testimony, which will convince the most skeptical that they can be restored to perfect health, and the vital forces thoroughly re-established same as if never affected. Sold ONLY by

For this purpose there is nothing equal to KRESS' FEVER TONIC. It is the Best & Safest Remedy known, and wherever used has given perfect satisfaction. In its composition neither Quinine, Arsenic, Strychnia, nor Mercury is used. It will cure the most stubborn cases of AGUE in a very short time and leaves the system strong and vigorous to resist MALARIA. One bottle usually is all that will be required, unless in aggravated cases, or where the patient is continually exposed to malarial poison, in such cases, a second bottle may be required. In small doses it will invariably counteract tendency to chills. KRESS' FEVER TONIC is no new remedy, but one long established, thoroughly tested, and found by experience to do all that is claimed for it. In another column will be found the experience of parties who have used it to which we ask your attention. Price One Dollar a Bottle, and is for sale by Druggists, everywhere. TRY IT if you have the slightest tendency to SHAKE! IT WILL CURE YOU!

Hidden Birds Puzzle.

"The western sky was robing itself in sunset hues, which shot flames over the tree-tops, when a singular kind of accident happened in Ravenna, New Hampshire. A bowl that Miss Dorothy Jay had with her on a picnic was broken by one of two boys wandering around with kites and guns. "Such awkwardness in the garcon," Dorothy learnedly said. The boys in wrath rushed through the woods, cocking their guns. The dog Snip escaped lately from the Merrimac, awakening the echoes by his bark, leaped over a brook and followed the trail. "Escape with your life, do, Dorothy," cried Mr. Jack Dawson. Miss Dorothy simply said "chaff." Inch by inch the boys drew nearer, shouting, "Whoop O," exactly like mad Poncas. So wary, however, was Miss Dorothy that the boys in a pet relinquished their design and contented themselves with stealing a silver clasp, arrow-shaped and of fine workmanship.

Another Candidate.

By a large majority the people of the United States have declared their faith in Kidney-Wort as a remedy for all the diseases of the kidneys and liver, some, however, have disliked the trouble of preparing it from the dry form. For such a new candidate appears in the shape of Kidney-Wort in Liquid Form. It is very concentrated, is easily taken and is equally efficient as the dry. Try it.—Louisville Post.

Wicked for Clergymen.

Rev. ——, Washington, D. C., writes: "I believe it to be all wrong and even wicked for clergymen or other public men to be led into giving testimonials to quack doctors or vile stuffs called medicines, but when a really meritorious article made of valuable remedies known to all, that all physicians use and trust in daily, we should freely commend it. I therefore cheerfully and heartily commend Hop Bitters for the good they have done me and my friends, firmly believing they have no equal for family use. I will not be without them."—[New York Baptist Weekly. 33-2t.

Holloway's Pills.

Never dispair—something that never fails—Fever and Ague—To the sick it is of little consequence how they are cured, whether from a rational view of the disease or by the rules defined for the guidance of the profession, so long as the cure is certain and expeditious. To a suffering man the question on the relative merits of quinine or calomel is uninteresting. The faculty may wrangle and discuss their various theories, but Dr. Holloway's treatment dispels doubt ere the disciples of Esculapius have finished the first stage. Holloway's Pills are the only remedies which effect a speedy and radical cure without danger of a relapse. Read the advertisement elsewhere.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the signature of J. HAYDOCK surrounds each box of Pills and Ointment. Boxes at 25 cents, 62 cents and $1 each.

How Watches are Made.

It will be apparent to any one, who will examine a SOLID GOLD WATCH, that aside from the necessary thickness for engraving and polishing, a large porportion of the precious metal used is needed only to stiffen and hold the engraved portions in place, and supply the necessary solidity and strength. The surplus gold is actually needless so far as UTILITY and beauty are concerned. In JAMES BOSS' PATENT GOLD WATCH CASES, this WASTE of precious metal is overcome, and the SAME SOLIDITY AND STRENGTH produced at from one-third to one half of the usual cost of solid cases. This process is of the most simple, nature, as follows: a plate of nickle composition metal, especially adapted to the purpose, has two plates of SOLID GOLD soldered one on each side. The three are then passed between polished steel rollers, and the result is a strip of heavy plated composition, from which the cases, backs, centres, bezels etc., are cut and shaped by suitable dies and formers. The gold in these cases is sufficiently thick to admit of all kinds of chasing, engraving and enameling; the engraved cases have been carried until worn perfectly smooth by time and use without removing the gold.

THIS IS THE ONLY CASE MADE WITH TWO PLATES OF SODID GOLD AND WARRANTED BY SPECIAL CERTIFICATE.

Communication.

ON THE OVERLAND, BOUND FOR THE STATES.

To visit the Yosemite we had eight or ten hours car ride, from San Francisco to Milton, then stage one hunded miles o'er hills and mountains to see nature's grandest effort in astonishing the human observer. I was surprised to find ranches every now and then all the way through the mountains, and occasionally little towns. I asked sometimes "how long have you lived here?" and was answered ten, or as many as thirty years. We passed one disirable farm nearly twenty miles from the railroad terminus, where they raised much fruit, delicious peaches, grapes, plums, melons, oranges, lemons and figs—the fig trees being nearly two feet in diameter, with wide spreading branches. Our coach was drawn by six horses and was crowded with passengers both to and from the valley. One coach passes each way daily. It took us one whole day and until nine o'clock in the morning the second day to make the hundred miles, but we were obliged to travel till eight at night and were called at four in the morning, and rode fifteen miles before breakfast, but instead of seeming very fatiguing I came out of the valley feeling much stronger and better than I entered it. It was a little dusty and pretty hot at times, but rather enjoyable after all. In the Valley are plenty of hotels, where you may pay from three to five dollars per day for board and lodging, for all food is hauled in with much labor and expense. We met little trains of burros with great packs, climbing the mountain to convey supplies. It seems astonishing to me the amount of money spent to see Yosemite. To be sure the scenery is grand, sublime, wonderful. It beggars my poor powers of description, but there are many fine writers who have attempted to picture their impressions and to those I might refer you, and add that from my reading of these authors I gained no adequate idea. Word painting is not sufficient. A sort of registering book is kept near one of the hotels where each guest is requested to write his or her name, and what state or country holds their residence, and requested to make any remarks they may desire or deem appropriate. The book is to be exhibited at our next centennial. It is a mammoth book and weighs one hundred and eight pounds, and even now some of the space allotted to each state and country is filled, so many tourists, and they will be obliged to add new pages—California, I believe, is already full. I will write here the thoughts which came to me there, and I jotted them down in the space for remarks, but they will seem so appropriate here, divorced from their surroundings. In order to see the sights, tourists hire trained horses and a guide, and on horseback climb the steep mountain side up very narrow, stony paths. I went with a party up to Nevada Falls in this way:

To have lived and died without ever a sight
Of this wondrous upheaval of rocky might;
To have never beheld the white foamy spray
Of these crystal waters thus chasing their way
From their granite heights, down the stony fall,
Would compare with the view as no living at all.

To have never pressed the back of a nag,
Which, with cautious step and a laggardly drag,
Safely carries you up by a circular route,
Clear to the topmost peak of nature's lookout,
Would have been at the best just a life so tame,
As scarce to deserve of the living, a name.

But as I prophesy now, in one hundred years
These walls, which are wet with Yosemite's tears,
They'll leisurely view from some airy balloon,
And then sail around the bald head of the dome;
And now, where we climb bringing sweat to the brow,
To gaze on the beauties of nature below,
They'll sit in a car and be hoisted in air,
'Th'out straining a muscle or moistening a hair.

The dome refered to is a rock over 5,000 feet high. Its summit is rounded, or dome shaped. I never saw a running stream of such clear water as the Merced river, which flows through the valley, and the piazza of our room at the hotel looked immediately down upon the placid surface, and 'twas amusing to me to sit and watch the gambols of the trout as they whisked here and there or were tempted into suspicious scrutiny of bits of crumbs thrown from the kitchen. Our party killed two rattlesnakes while climbing among the rocks. Most beautiful, delicate ferns of a variety of colors are found among the rocks, but our visit was not at the season for gathering so as to preserve their beauty. Some living in the valley dry and preserve the ferns away in albums, and sell them to tourists for ten dollars per copy. There is an old gentleman living here, cunning in working woods, and he has made a specialty of collecting every variety known to these mountains, and works curiously inlaid little articles of virtu with the woods in their natural colors. He is yet working on a stand commenced seven years ago, made of innumerable pieces, cut in various devices and forms. Not really seven years of labor, but uses his spare, odd bits of time in this way. Many pleasure seekers from distant states prepare themselves with teams, wagons and camping out-fit and spend many weeks in the valley, enjoying the grandest, most soul-inspiring scenery; but oh, how rudely they live! And it is impossible for them to look otherwise than rusty, dusty and dirty. Women show their little sense of propriety and utility in dress when they wear their long skirts and slippers on such an expedition, among the rocks, the rattlesnakes the dust and the bushes, climbing the rugged mountains sides, which at times are almost perpendicular, trying to breathe in health with the mountain air, and yet have the waist compressed by corset, and hands and feet tormented with petticoats. It is wickedly absurd! And makes my woman's blood boil to be thus reminded of our sex's infirmity, and see how servilely we type out our weakness. As to the object for and needs of dress, women are idiots. At the sea shore in bathing costumes their habiliments failed to conceal bare arms from the shoulder, and bare legs from a little above the knees, bare heads and bare necks oftentimes. If Americans conclude it is artistically beautiful for women in the drawing room to wear both feet through a single trouser's leg, let them continue their present style there, but out under the broad canopy of heaven with sticks, stones and tar weed for a carpet, attempting so-called masculine sports, foregoing all artifical luxuries to enjoy this rough phase of natural life and beauty for the ostensible purpose of gaining health and having a good time. For the sake of suffering humanity, oh, fickle godess, let woman have the free use of her limbs, and make her know that she has as natural a right to a whole pair of pants and to act her natural self and to be what she really is, a biped, as her brother man.

We visited San Francisco with her wonderful street cars, or railroad, her immense Palace hotel and its remarkable appointments, and periodical display of wealth in furnishing for the public, and rode away out to the Cliff House and sat on the piazza and watched the sea lions sunning themselves on the rocks and now and then plunging into the surging foam for a little swim. On the rocks they looked to me like mammoth snails as they laboriously crawled about, and like great dogs when swimming. It is nearly always cold enough for heaviest wraps at Cliff House. Our last visit in California was made in Sacramento, where we found the weather exceedingly warm the first week in August. They have ague here in this city of wealth, and mosquitoes, and flies, and the most beautiful residences, built of wood, I ever saw anywhere. I don't wish to live in Sacramento, nor any place I have seen in Cailfornia, save San Jose. She is nearest my ideal city, but I am homeward bound, and may be in Auburn before this goes into print.

To Accommodate the Public.

The proprietors of that immensely popular remedy, Kidney-Wort, in recognition of the claims of the public which has so liberally patronized them, have prepared a liquid preparation of that remedy for the special accommodation of those who from any reason dislike to prepare it for themselves. It is very concentrated and, as the dose is small, it is more easily taken by many. It has the same effectual action in all diseases of the kidneys, liver and bowels. —[Home and Farm.

Around About Us.

One of the county commissioners, of Kosciusko county, Allen Smith, died at his home in Milford, August 19. Aged 58 years.

The Catholic church, a few miles north of Edgerton, Ohio, was burned about a week ago. Supposed to be the work of an incendiary.

Our exchanges have all been looking at the new comet. It could be seen a few day ago in the northwest, just after sunset, but will not be in sight for many days.

The governor has appointed Hon. H. B. Sayler, of Huntington, to the judgeship made vacant by the death of Judge Slack. Mr. Sayler, was formerly a representative in congress from this district, as then constituted.

An exchange is responsible for the following: J. S. Davis, of Clark county, is the owner of the largest peach orchard in the state. It includes 30,000 trees, and covers 500 acres of land. Each tree is expected this year to produce one bushel of marketable fruit.

Harry Hans, the bill poster man, is in trouble again. He has been running a show, and on his return from a recent trip, undertook to cowhide the city editor of the South Bend Register, Mr. W. E. Beal. Beal defended himself with a revolver, firing two shots, but without effect. Both were arrested. Hans was fined $5.00 and costs, and Beal dischaged.

A turkey hen belonging to D. Stanford, of Buck township, started out last Saturday morning with four young turkeys. At night she returned with but three. That ain't very remarkable, but the remarkable part of this story is to come. At night it returned with three young turkeys and six young quails, which she still has with her, and which she carefully provides and hovers as she does her own brood, and they follow her and observe her calls as they would a quail mother. This is remarkable.—[Kenton Democrat.

The South Bend Register says:—Wrecking Boss Little, of the Grand Trunk road, Sunday, succeeded in getting the large mogul engine out of its bed in the marsh 2½ miles west of town. She had been in the just three weeks Monday and owing to the soft mucky soil had kept sinking further in the mire every day. Mr. Little had a special derrick built for the job and hoisted the 40 ton monster out of the mud bodily. He also took photographer Bonney out to the scene Monday morning, and had some views taken of the engine in different positions as she was being hoisted. At noon 66 orders for the views had already been received. Mr. Little takes pardonable pride in his success, and the Grand Trunk road evidently has the right man in the right place.

The St. Joseph Valley Register has the following very sensible article:

Indiana, though occasionally mentioned patronizingly as the hoosier state, always makes her strength felt when occasion offers. During the war her soldiers were classed among the best disciplined and most efficient in elections her majority is anxiously looked for, and in the matter of common school education she stands amo'g the foremost in the land. In compliment to this superb system the catalogue of West Point shows that out of 130 applicants for admission at the last examination sixty-nine only succeeded in passing the rigid scrutiny of the examiners, and of these six were Indiana boys. Of the fifty-three who graduated from the institution in June, there were six Indiana students.

Is it Possible

that a remedy made of such common, simple plants as Hops, Buchu, Mandrake, Dandelion etc., make so many and such marvelous and wonderful cures as Hop Bitters do? It must be, for when old and young, rich and poor, pastor and doctor, lawyer and editor, all testify to having been cured by them, we must believe and doubt no longer. See other column. —[Post. 85-2w.

Its Action is Sure and Safe.

The celebrated remedy Kidney-Wort can now be obtained in the usual dry vegetable form, or in liquid form. It is put in the latter way for the especial convenience of those who cannot readily prepare it. It will be found very concentrated and will act with equal efficiency in either case. Be sure and read the new advertisement for particulars. —South and West.

Butler.

While attending the reunion at Butler last week, we could not help noticing the rapid improvements that have been going on for the past few months. Not only is there a change in railroad matters, but the town itself is spreading its borders. Many new dwellings are going up, or are already completed and occupied, and we learn that a number of others are to be erected at an early day. A large force of men is now at work on the new Wabash road, putting in the extra tracks need to accommodate the business of the road. This of course makes it lively for hotels and boarding houses, and leaves a great deal of money in the town. But the business part of the town does not seem to be gaining so much as it should under these favorable circumstances. The burnt district ought to be rebuilt, and some of those old wooden rookeries that disgrace so many of our towns, ought to be removed, and substantial buildings put in there stead. Perhaps these will all be done in good time, but if the people allow themselves to believe that a railroad boom alone will put their town in good shape, they will wake up some day to find themselves mistaken. However, we did not start out to give advice, and only add that we are pleased to see our sister town show so many evidences of a renewed prosperity.

And, upon retiring, the fireman used a small portion of Dr. McDonald's celebrated cement as a preventive to sleep walking, and up to present writing it has given entire satisfaction. R.

"THE MONOLOGUE OF DEATH."

[These lines, spoken by the Spirit of Death, in the guise of a White Pilgrim, are altered from a tragedy called "The White Pilgrim," and printed for the first time in their present form.]

Miscall me not! Men have miscalled me much;
Have given harsh names and harsher thoughts to me,
Reviled and evilly entreated me,
Built me strange temples to an unknown God;
Then called me idol, devil, unclean thing,
And to rude insult bowed my godhead down.
Miscall me not! for men have marred my form,
And in the earth-born grossness of their thought
Have rudely modeled me of their own clay,
Then fear to look on that themselves have made.
Miscall me not! ye know not what I am,
But ye shall see me face to face, and know.

I take all sorrows from the sorrowful,
And teach the joyful what it is to joy;
I gather in my land-locked harbor's shade
The shattered vessels of a vexed world;
And even the tiniest ripple upon life
Is, to my sublime calm, as tropic storm.
When other leechcraft fails the breaking brain,
I, only, own the anodyne to still [illegible]
The face, distorted with life's latest pang,
I smooth, in passing, with an angel-wing;
And from beneath the quiet eyelids steal
A new and nobler beauty to the rest.
Miscall me not! the plagues that walk the earth,
The wasting pain, the sudden agony,
Famine and war, and pestilence, and all
The terrors that have darkened round my name—
These are the plagues of Life—they are not mine;
Yet while I tarry, vanish when I come,
Instantly melting into perfect peace,
As at His word, whose Master-spirit I am,
The troubled waters slept on Galilee.

When I withdraw the veil that hides my face,
So melt I with a look the iron bonds
Of the soul's jailer, hard Mortality,
Gently—so gently—like a tired child,
Will I infold thee; but thou durst not look
Upon my face, and stay. In the busy haunts
Of human life—in the temple and the street,
And when the blood runs fullest in the veins—
Unseen, undreamed of, I am often by,
Divided from the giant in his strength
But by the thickness of this misty veil.

Tender I am, not cruel; when I take
The shape most hard to human eyes, and pluck
The little baby-blossom yet unblown,
'Tis but to graft it on a kindlier stem,
And leaping o'er the perilous years of growth,
Unswept of sorrow, and unscathed of wrong,
Clothe it at once with rich maturity.
'Tis I that give a soul to Memory,
For round the follies of the bad I throw
The mantle of a kind forgetfulness;
While, canonized in dear love's calendar,
I sanctify the good for evermore.
Miscall me not! my generous fullness lends
Home to the homeless; to the friendless, friends;
To the starved babe, the mother's tender breast;
Wealth to the poor, and to the restless—Rest.

A BAD LOT.

On a June morning in the year 1875, Maj. Cyril Palmer and his friend, Amos Maxwell, sat in the bay window of the former's country house, discussing a certain weighty and private family affair.

The Major—or rather ex-Major, for he retired from the army after serving in the late war—was a man of 40, bronzed, wrinkled, a trifle gray, stern-featured and leaden-eyed. Though quite wealthy, he affected a disorderly poverty of dress, and indulged in those habits of cheap dissipation which mark the decadence of so many scions of old and influential country families.

Maxwell—a small attorney, of political aspirations—was a very different man in outward semblance to the ex-officer, though their characters were quite similar. In place of the Major's brown and toughened face, ornamented with a coarse nose, a thick bristly mustache and those side whiskers which define the lower line of the inferior maxillary bone, the lawyer presented a pale, sharp countenance, smoothly shaven, and almost devoid of character. The habits which had left the Major's cheeks and nose empurpled by tiny veins, which remained injected with blood, had increased the pallor of the attorney's face and made it more striking by sundry black specks and pimples, which were horribly suggestive of mortification. In place of the Major's bull neck and rotund chest, his friend exhibited a throat like that of a turtle, and a cavernous thoracic region. Their dress, too, was almost at opposite extremes. The officer sported his clothes, and the lawyer was merely covered by his. The former wore a dark-blue frogged frock coat, gray pantaloons, a small glazed cap with gilt buttons, and carried a heavy malacca cane; while the latter wore a conventional suit of rusty black, and a silk hat, half covered with bombazine in lieu of crape.

"If I had the whole property," remarked the Major, "I could live very comfortably. It is not enough for two, however; and the sooner I can get Liz married off the better."

"But she won't marry against the provisions of your excellent father's will," replied Maxwell. "You can't make her marry young Davis unless she wants to. If I understand it, she is to marry the one you approve of, or lose her half of the estate."

"Yes."

"Well, the chances are—you'll excuse me—the chances are that she will outlive you twenty years. If you die, the whole goes to her, don't it?"

"Yes."

"Then what are you going to do about it? I don't see how you can gain anything by her marrying."

"I can't, unless I make her marry somebody I disapprove of."

"She isn't a fool. She won't marry for love in a cottage, and lose her property by it."

Maj. Palmer was forced to confess that he didn't think it likely. No one who had ever seen the cold, still, dispassionate, totally selfish beauty of Elizabeth Palmer could have suspected her of any such weakness.

"I know," said the Major, "that she would give her right hand to marry Bill Davis, but——"

"But she wouldn't give $30,000."

"No; she's fond of him—very fond of him—but she has sense with it; and, what is worse, thinks that she will only have to wait a couple of years to see me turn my toes up; then she'll marry whom she likes, and have the whole pile to herself. Can't get ahead of these women. There isn't any such thing in the book."

"Not unless you come to life after she marries, and object to her choice."

"By Jove! Amos, I believe you hit it. Can't I fix that?"

"What do you mean?"

"Go off and leave a will; get some fellow to swear I'm dead; let her marry Davis, and then turn up unexpectedly and raise thunder with the whole thing!"

"Too risky. It might pay to let on that you are dying, and trust to luck for her to anticipate your death. You might lie unconscious—non compos mentis, or something of that sort—for a few weeks, and be unable to say anything about the marriage. Then, just before the ceremony, you can get well enough to express an opinion against it, and, by virtue of your guardianship, claim that she has forfeited all right to the estate. She needn't hear of it, though, till the knot is tied."

"Can that be put through legally?"

"Yes, by the aid of a little money!"

"It will be worth five thousand dollars to you if you can do it."

"I can try it, anyhow."

"Amos, you're a trump! You and I were always good friends, even when I used to lick you at school; and we ought to give each other a lift whenever we can—eh?"

"Yes; I will do all I can. It will be a slippery business, but I think I can do it."

"Good! Let us have a glass of brandy and water on it. My hand isn't very steady this morning, and I need a little something to regulate my nerves."

A few days after this, Cyril Palmer informed his sister that he felt "very queer," and was going to New York to consult a physician. He had been threatened with an attack of mania a potu, and she naturally supposed that, as he still drank excessively, this tendency was returning. It is humiliating to my humanitarian instincts to be obliged to confess that her only thought was of the probability of her speedy acquirement of her own liberty and her brother's share of the property.

A letter from the city—received a fortnight later, and signed by a somewhat celebrated, though unscrupulous, medical practitioner—conveyed her news of the Major's severe and perhaps dangerous illness. She was warned that he might not live but a few days longer; and, although he could not see any one save his nurse and physician just then, she must hold herself ready to visit him at any time.

She immediately began making preparations for her marriage, as privately as possible, with young Davis, who had squandered his own wealth, and desired to squander that of the Palmers.

Before long, another missive from the doctor announced that the Major lay in a state of apathy, unable to recognize any person, and evidently beyond the reach of science. If his sister wished to see him alive, she had best come at once. She did so, for the sake of the world's opinion, and found him in bed, in a darkened chamber, apparently unconscious. In a period of previous lucidity he had arranged all his affairs, and left her sole heir to and mistress of the entire property.

Once assured of this fact, the young lady had no hesitation in prosecuting her plans. Amos Maxwell showed her the greatest friendliness, and finished by advising her to marry young Davis, if she wished, immediately.

"You will pardon me, Miss," he said, "if I speak plainly, but it is my habit. No one had a greater regard for your brother, the Major, than I. We were fast friends from boyhood, though our paths differed widely. But he is now gone, as far as practical results are concerned, and I do not see why his prejudices should be respected, when they are of such an unjust nature. I have often tried to reason him out of his dislike to Mr. Davis, but in vain. I drew up his testament, and can assure you that, at the moment of his death, you will be entirely free in this respect. Now, if you wait till then, it will seem in bad taste to marry before you have left off your mourning. My advice is for you to marry before you put it on."

This was apparently sound counsel, and Davis seconded it with all his might. Miss Palmer thought it over, coolly and collectedly, weighing all the chances, and finally decided that she had best follow the suggestions of her lawyer and her lover.

In a very short space of time all the arrangements for the wedding were completed. The Major, who was enjoying a loose sort of life in town, and really bringing himself nearer to his feigned condition than he would have liked to acknowledge, was kept well informed of all the movements of Davis and Miss Palmer by Amos Maxwell, who acted as legal adviser on both sides.

On the eve of the marriage, the lawyer suggested the possibility of a partial failure to the Major.

"When they find you've recovered, they will use every exertion to retain possession of their half of the estate," said he; "and, though the terms of the will are explicit in commanding Elizabeth to marry according to your wishes, yet it is very difficult to keep a legal heiress out of her property by any such provision in this country. If they choose to go to law and fight hard, you will be likely to lose the suit."

"The deuce I will!"

"Yes; and the court may suspect a conspiracy, too—in which case you will suffer. It would be safest for you to get all your property out of your hands before you attempt such a stroke."

"How shall I work it?"

"Oh, it is easy enough; make over all your real estate to some friend, for the time being; then, if you fail, you will at least have lost nothing."

The Major, too ignorant of law to know whether this was sound or not, but placing implicit confidence in Maxwell, made over every cent he possessed to that gentleman; and expressed himself, in the presence of several witnesses, as greatly opposed to the match his sister was about to make—asserting that he would either prevent it or keep her out of her share of the estate.

NEW YORK, Oct. 8, 1855.

ELIZABETH PALMER: Don't marry Davis. I am recovering, and forbid the marriage.

CYRIL PALMER.

The message fell like a thunderbolt upon the newly-married couple, who had fancied Cyril dying. Before they had recovered from their alarm and astonishment, or decided what to do, the Major returned—looking a little worn out, perhaps, but by no means so emaciated as they had reason to expect. His first communication with his sister was a declaration that he should never consent to the match, and, if possible, should not allow her a farthing.

Legal steps were immediately taken, and the ex-officer, having seen nothing of his crony, Maxwell, for some days, called upon him for advice as to the best mode of procedure.

"I am sorry, my dear Major," said the cadaverously respectable little lawyer, "but I really cannot act in your behalf any further."

"What!"

"I have discovered that our proceedings were illegal, and I cannot go on with them. Indeed, I have been retained by Mr. Davis to conduct his side of the case!"

The Major was the thunderstruck party now.

"Why, you infernal little rascal," said he, getting dangerously purple in the face, "what do you mean? Are you going to betray me?"

"Don't use hard words, sir. I know my business, I believe; and this is my office."

"I know it is; and I take this opportunity of kicking you out of your own premises!" replied the Major, with a terrific oath. The next moment Maxwell was sprawling on the walk, outside of his office door, and Palmer was standing over him brandishing his cane.

"Assault and battery! You shall sweat for this!" cried the lawyer.

"And you smart for it now, don't you?" said the Major, laughing grimly as he strode away.

He did not laugh long, however. On sending to get the titles, etc., to the property which had been made over to the attorney, the latter returned word that he knew nothing about Maj. Palmer's affairs, and cared less than he knew. The property had been assigned in due form, with all the necessary precautions, and Amos Maxwell could keep it as well as not, if he chose. The fact dawned upon the Major's mind, gradually, that he had been a dupe and was now a beggar. In trying to overreach his sister he had been overreached himself, just as she had nearly fallen victim to her own covetous desire for his share of the parental legacy.

Having still the reputation of being wealthy, Maj. Palmer found little difficulty in procuring another lawyer, and determined to leave no stone unturned to be avenged upon Amos. He first engaged in a suit with his sister for the enforcement of the terms of the will, and for a long time the war was waged with great skill on both sides. The indomitable unscrupulousness of Maxwell, who was retained by the defendants, triumphed finally, and the Major found himself without a home, without means and heavily in debt.

There was nothing to be done except to wreak military vengeance upon all parties, so the ex-officer sat down and wrote to Amos, accusing him of having misrepresented, turned traitor, swindled and committed various other ungentlemanly actions, for all which he must have "satisfaction."

The only answer to this was a warrant for the Major's arrest. Sending a challenge is an infraction of the law.

As soon as this new misfortune was settled, the victimized Major, still smarting for revenge, challenged Davis, who readily accepted. Singularly enough, although Maxwell lived in the same house with Davis—the former country-seat of the Major, in fact—and enjoyed the greatest intimacy with his quandam clients, he took no steps whatever to have the challenger arrested again. On the contrary, he counseled Davis to fight, and "settle the business once for all."

The cold, gray daylight of a November morning broke upon a barbarous scene, enacted by Cyril Palmer, William Davis and two or three of their acquaintances. As the sun rose, dull and ghastly the simultaneous report of two pistols rang upon the misty air, and Davis fell, dying, with a terrible wound in his left side.

His antagonist, who had raised a little money in expectation of the emergency, immediately fled to the West, where he remained in the obscurity of an incognito for a year, supporting himself by giving lessons in boxing, fencing, riding, etc., in a small town. The life he was leading there, however, grew insupportable, and hoping to effect a reconciliation with his sister he wrote to a friend in New York if it would be safe to return. The reply he received gave him hope and confidence. Pains had been taken to hush the duel up, and a rumor, ingeniously circulated, had given the public to understand that Davis had accidentally shot himself while out gunning.

One week from the date of the letter that bore this welcome intelligence the Major entered a restaurant in New York, where he had just arrived, and, taking a seat in one of the boxes, ordered breakfast. He was worn by travel and changed by his year's experiences. His hair had fallen away from the top of his head, and was thickly sprinkled with white, as were also his whiskers and mustache. A deep cicatrice across his left cheek and nose—the effect of a wound accidentally given by one of his fencing pupils with a broken foil—made his expression more sinister than ever, and his attire, though still preserving something of the military style, was shockingly seedy, looking as though he was in the habit of sleeping in his clothes.

The waiter who took the order brought him the morning paper and a brandy cocktail, as he directed, to "steady his nerves," drew down the box curtain, and went to order the eggs and coffee on which the Major always breakfasted.

It was still early, and the only persons in the saloon were the barkeeper and this one waiter. While the latter was gone, the barkeeper heard a groan—a convulsive movement—a struggle in the box where the Major sat—and ran to see what was the matter.

It was not much—the Major was only dying of apoplexy!

He had come to New York with a strong belief that he could work upon his sister's feelings of sympathy and pity sufficiently to persuade her into allowing him to live with her free of expense. He promised himself that he would behave kindly toward her, and pass the rest of his days in quiet idleness, without harming anybody, or being harmed. After the existence he had led, this prospect seemed delightful to him, and it is not strange that his disordered and ruined system should have given way under the shock which the following newspaper announcement gave him, as he ran his eye down the marriage notices:

"Maxwell—Davis—On the 10th, at Palmer's Landing, by the Rev. John Biblebanger, Amos Maxwell, Esq., to Mrs. Elizabeth Palmer Davis, relict of the late Wm. Davis, all of Palmer's Landing."

So, while the one rascal was entering upon the enjoyment of the entire Palmer estate of over $60,000, the other rascal was dying alone and unfriended. The assumed name he had borne served to prevent any one from identifying him, and his very grave is forgotten among the thousands in Potter's Field.

Grumbling at the Miller.

It is not uncommon to hear of a man who has not sense enough to go to the mill, but it would seem slanderous to say that the majority of men who are always complaining of the millers have not sense enough to see that the majority of the difficulties complained of arise from faults or conditions that the farmer may correct. At least Mr. J. Hollister, now farmer, once a miller, says as much to the Adrian Farmers' Club in a paper on the milling question. One would suppose that farmers would know enough to take only clean wheat to mill when they wish good flour. But the fact is, the majority take no pains to clean out all cockle, cheat, light and sprouted wheat and filth. They carry a grist of such a mixture to the miller, and ask him to give them for it as much prime flour as can be made from an equal weight of pure plump wheat.

The miller must discount dirty, chaffy wheat. He can give only as much good flour as the good wheat will make, less the toll.

For cleaning it he gets well paid in the screenings, which go for feed, and which the farmer had better kept at home. Mr. Hollister advises such men to thoroughly clean their grain before going to mill.

Again, some farmers think a clean thing can come out of an unclean one, or pure flour or meal can come out of a filthy old bag that perhaps has been used for carrying out rotten potatoes from the cellar, and moist and dirty, thrown down to mould, to be picked up in a hurry and carried off to bring home the flour in.

The very men who take dirty wheat in dirty sacks are the chaps who complain that they get short returns and poor flour from their grists, and as this class of men take only a two bushel sack at a time, their poor wives are never sure how that new batch of flour is going to act, and bread-making is all luck and chance in that household.

Mr. Hollister says three times a year is often enough to go to mill. The flour, if packed in paper sacks, will grow better every day, and better flour is made from large grists. Old flour is the best, because the water has evaporated, and the flour has become drier and stronger.

Now these facts we have before presented in these columns, and for these reasons it is our custom to go to mill but once a year, except for ground feed for the stock. After the wheat is threshed we clean up thoroughly enough to furnish the family bread for a year. This, with barrels to hold the flour, and sacks to hold the bran and shorts, go in one load to the mill. We tell our miller we are in no hurry for that grist, but some day in October or November, when the weather is cool enough, and not too cold, and when the mill is in the best order, we wish him to do his best work, for which we pay by the barrel. We thus get the best for the least outlay. The miller likes that way, and the housekeeper has a staple article of flour, that she knows how to manipulate. Bread-making is thus reduced more nearly to a regular and reliable operation—from which uniform results may be expected.

If a farmer must, from force of habit, go to mill with one sack of wheat, he will get better flour to exchange wheat for flour.—Cincinnati Commercial.

Cotton Mather and the Quakers of 1682.

Times change, and men change with them. So do their views of what is right and just. To-day the Friends are held in fellowship by the Christian people, and their preachers are welcomed to the pulpits of other denominations. Two hundred years ago, the great New England divine, Cotton Mather, could write concerning them the following letter, and think he was doing God service. The letter is said to have been discovered among some old papers in the Massachusetts Historical Society, and bears date, "September ye 15, 1682," and is addressed to "Ye aged and beloved John Higinson:"

"There be now at sea a shippe (for one Friend, Elias Holdcroft, of London, did advise me by the last packet, and it would sail sometime in August, called ye Welcome.) R. Green was master, which has aboard a hundred or more of ye heretics and malignants, called Quakers, with W. Penn, who is ye scamp at ye head of them. Ye General Court has accordingly given secret orders to Master Malachi Huxlett, of ye brig Porpoise, to way laye ye said Welcome as near ye coast of Codd as may be, and make captives of ye said Penn and his ungodlie crew, so that ye Lord may be glorified and not mocked on ye soil of this new country with ye heathen worshipp of these people. Much spoil can be made by selling ye whole lot to Barbadoes, where slaves fetch good prices in rumme and sugar, and we shall not only do ye Lord great service by punishing ye wicked, but shall make gayne for his ministers and people.

"Yours, in ye bowels of Christ,

"COTTON MATHER."

The Lord was so unmindful of the good of his chosen people that he allowed William Penn to escape good Master Huxlett, and "His ministers and people" were left to mourn the loss of their "rumme and sugar."

Bathing.

The end of the day is the best time for a sponge-bath; a sponge and a coarse towel have often cured insomnia where diacodium failed. A bucketful of tepid water will do for ordinary purposes; daily shower-baths in winter-time are as preposterous as hot drinks in the dog-days. Russian baths and ice-water cures owe their repute to the same popular delusion that ascribes miraculous virtues to nauseating drugs—the mistrust of our natural instincts, culminating in the idea that all natural things must be injurious to men, and that the efficacy of a remedy depends on the degree of its repulsiveness. Ninety-nine boys in a hundred would rather take the bitterest medicine than a cold bath in mid-winter. If we leave children and animals to the guidance of their instincts they will become amphibious in the dog-days, and quench their thirst at the coldest spring without fear of injurious consequences; but in winter-time even wild beasts avoid immersion with an instinctive dread. A Canadian bear will make a wide circuit, or pick his way over the floes rather than swim a lake in cold weather. Baptist missionaries do not report many revivals before June. Warm springs, on the other hand, attract all the birds and beasts that stay with us in winter-time; the hot spas of Rockport, Ark., are visited nightly by raccoons and foxes in spite of all torchlight hunts; and Haxthausen tells us that in hard winters the thermæ of Pactigorsk, in the Eastern Caucasus, attract deer and wild hogs from the distant Terek valley. I know the claims of the hydropathic school, and the arguments pro and con, but the main points of the controversy still hinge upon the issue between nature's testimony and Dr. Priessnitz's.—F. L. Oswald, in Popular Science Monthly.

The Swine Pest.

It has long been known in England, Germany and France, but under different names. Such as anthrax and sty fever. But the rose smells as sweet by any other name, and the history of swine husbandry shows that the pest is alike deadly in the new or old world. That it spreads readily from one herd to another is well known. That one sick pig wandering about may innoculate hundreds of others is a fact proven by sad experience.

There are men living in this civilized country that are so destitue of intelligence, or regard for rights of others, or who are so ignorant of the nature of this terrible disease that they will allow their swine to run at large when they are known to have the cholera in the worst form.

This class of men feed their hogs on the road just enough to make them come home to the call and allow them to ramble in the neighboring woods, or to forage in their neighbor's fields. Swine that is accustomed to hunt for their own living can scale a stone wall, climb a nine rail fence, or undermine a five board fence, or invade premises surrounded by an osage hedge. Such brutes are owned by a class of men meaner than the animals, which follow only the demands of nature. They must hunt or die, and the depraved owner starves the poor brutes to make them more vigilant in hunting a living on the neighbor's premises.

Swine of this class of men and hogs infest every township in the State, and make a universal swine plague possible. We know of a neighborhood of careful breeders of thoroughbred swine. Their farms are well fenced and well cultivated, and they never allow a pig or a calf on the highway. They feed liberally every animal they possess, believing that the generous care of stock is the road to success. They love their fine stock and take a pride in it. They live in dread, however, of neighbors, who care not for the wants of their stock nor the rights of their fellow-man.

We know of many cases where the plague has appeared in lands after some sick pig from the road has invaded the premises of a most careful man. These men, who have with great care and at great outlay collected a fine herd of recorded swine, must lose by such invasions not only valuable animals, but the accumulated excellence of a herd which can not be replaced by money. With the death of model thoroughbred animals sink one's means of enjoying the benefits of his reputation as a careful breeder. He can not longer supply his old customers, and he can not buy such animals as to fill the place of those lost. The careful breeding of a lifetime may be swept away in a fortnight by the wandering into his premises of one of these miserable pests.

Here we have a community of careful, intelligent farmers, who are doing a grand work for the improvement of the stock of the Nation, exposed to the ravages of a pestilence, simply because of a reckless, careless farmer who lives near them.

Pasteur, of France, has shown that animals dying of anthrax and buried may be the means of conveying the disease to herds grazing over the graves years after. He cites abundant proof. His views are corroborated by Professor Law, of Cornell. It is generally accepted as true that a pen, or lot, or field in which cholera hogs have been is infected, and herds put into that pen, lot or field will take the disease.

To this we may add that after a place has once become infected and herds die there, each successive outbreak of the disease takes a most virulent form.

In view of such dangers as not only the annual loss of millions of dollars, but also of the permanent poisoning of the premises, does not the case become alarming and call for an intelligent and combined effort of every farmer in the the land to prevent further spread of the swine plague?

The attention of legislators should be given to this question. How to check and stamp out hog cholera. Public health and property are closely associated with the prosperity of the producers of our meat supply. If the herds of cattle and swine are to be left longer unprotected against the ravages of pleuro-pneumonia and cholera it is impossible to estimate the present and future loss. Those who have given these diseases the most study are confident that they can be held in check and finally stamped out, but it must be done by the aid of wise legislation of the State and General Government.—Cincinnati Commercial.

WHEN a traveler goes to Europe does he generally complete the Turin, Italy?—Yonkers Statesman. Not always. FACTS FOR THE CURIOUS.

THE carcharodon (shark), the forefather of the man-eater of to-day, was from 100 to 150 feet in length. A good-sized horse and cart could have been driven into its mouth.

THE female spider spins the webs; the male is a wanderer. In nine cases out of ten the female eats her husband up. Eleven skeletons have been found in one madame's "back yard."

EVERY adult man has 1,400 square feet of lungs; or, rather, the mucous membrane lining the air-cells of his lungs, if spread upon a smooth, plane surface, would cover an extent of 1,400 square feet.

ROMAN gladiators received sometimes as much as $3,000 per year by the sale of the mixture of oil and sweat, called strigamenta, which was scraped from their bodies after their contests. This mixture was made into pills, which were sold as a tonic for endowing strength and prolonging life.

THEMISTOCLES could call by their names the 20,000 citizens of Athens. Cyrus is reported to have known the name of every soldier in his army. Hortensius (after Cicero, the greatest orator of Rome), after sitting a whole day at a public sale, correctly enunciated from memory all the things sold, their prices and the names of their purchasers.

THERE was once a curious saying in England, "When once hempe is spun, England is done," which became a prophecy fulfilled when James I. ascended the throne by the death of those sovereigns whose initials spelled the fatal word, Henry, Edward, Mary, Philip (Mary's Spanish husband), Elizabeth. "England was done," then, since James of Scotland was King.

WRITERS on natural history describe a hideous reptile known as the fishing frog, which angles for its game as expertly and with as great success as the most adroit fly-fisher. He is a clumsy, awkward swimmer, but nature has compensated him for his unwieldiness by furnishing him with an equivalent for a rod and line, with bait always ready for use. Two elongated tentacles spring from his nose, which taper away like actual fishing rods. To the end of them is attached by a slender filament, which serves the purpose of a line, a bait in the form of a shiny bit of membrane. The hooks are set in the mouth of the fisherman down below, and in order to induce the fish to venture within reach of them the angler stirs up the mud at the bottom with his fins and tail. This attracts the fish, and conceals him from their observation. He then plies his rod; the glittering bait glows in the water like a living insect. The dazed fish are taken in great numbers, perfectly circumvented by the trick of the crafty angler.

A Classic Drunkard.

If the Providence Journal states the fact correctly, the barkeeper was about to close up. He had said so several times, and had put out all the lights but one. The old fixtures had shook the sawdust from their feet and reluctantly directed their footsteps homeward. Only a stranger appeared, a dark, saddened man, who sat demurely on a stool and kept his thumbs revolving around each other like white mice turning a wheel.

When the coast was clear he stepped up to the bar and said softly: "May I whisper a word in your ear?"

"You may, mister, if you will be quick about it," replied the drink-maker, with his hand on the lamp-screw.

"I want you to fill me a flask of your best whisky for family sickness," said the stranger, drawing out an ancient wallet, with twenty fathoms of leather string wound around it,—a well-worn wallet that looked as if all the waves and billows of bad luck had beat upon it, and gone over it and through it, and flattened it and washed it out clean.

The barman filled him up a pint, shoved down the cork until it squeaked, wiped the bottle dry and sat it upon the counter.

"The autumnal air is getting a trifle tartish," soliloquized the stranger. "Would you have any objection to my taking a little liver padder from my bottle?"

He filled the tumbler quite full, took it as he did paragoric in the days of his infancy, and then remarked:

"Perhaps, on the whole, as the night has far waned, and my family are on their spiral springs and in their trundles, you had better put my bottle away on the upper shelf, and when Phœbus Apollo begins to canter his golden prancers along the avenues of the purpling east, I will call for it, and you may then assess me the appropriate amount of ducats."

The barkeeper sprang over the bar and began to kick him.

"What!" he said sweetly, "you kick me after I have drunk? Don't you know better than that? Kick me with both feet—I cannot feel you even then. Before I took that glass, if you had but shook your fist at me you would have wounded me—hurt me; but now I scorn the physical punishment. Good-night," he said, as he stood on the doorstep. "I see by the shadow on the sidewalk that you have kicked me again. You should remember, my irascible publican, what the dear old poet said: 'Fate cannot harm me now, I have dined to-day.' So say I. I have drunk to-night. Good-night, taverner! How much the sparkling firmament looks like a far-off city, lit up for a festal night! Farewell! I shall see you later."

The Smith Family.

Ever since John Smith left old England and went to roaming about Virginia with an Indian tied on one arm, as a shield to catch the arrows fired at him by Pow-hat-on and a lot of red scallawags without a hat on, the Smiths have been a wandering race. They have been prolific as well as nomadic, and big and little Smiths are scattered up and down this vale of tears as thick as bowlders on a New England farm. On a certain occasion two wags made a bet that there were and were not twenty-five Smiths in Haymarket Theater, London, one night when Garrick was playing there and the house was crowded. They went to the theater, and one of them jumping upon a seat hurriedly inquired if Mr. Smith was present. Fifty-one gentlemen arose. "The Mr. Smith I wish to see is bald-headed," shouted the joker. Twenty-seven human billiard balls remained standing, each trying to pull the islands of hair growing to the starboard of his temple to the highest point of his cranium. The bet was won.

Serviceable Teeth.

The barbarousea, a species of wild hog, has its upper canine teeth modified in a most singular way to serve as a protection to the eyes, as the animal forces its way through the dense undergrowth of the tropical forests; they rise almost vertically through the upper lip, and frequently curve backward so much as to pierce the skull. The beaver with his sharp, chisel-faced front teeth, will cut down and carry off trees as big as a man's thigh, gnawing the wood all round, but cutting it higher on one side, so as to determine the direction of the fall. In one place on the banks of the Missouri, the timber was completely penetrated for a distance of three acres, and in great part removed, although the trees were very numerous and of considerable size. So hard is the enamel of the beaver's tooth that when fixed in a wooden handle it makes a very respectable chisel, and, according to Sir John Richardson, it is used by the Northern Indians to cut bone, and to shape their horn-tipped spears, etc. The incisor teeth of the agouti, another of the rodents, are used in the same way by the Brazilian Indians to fashion the blow tubes with which they bring down small birds and monkeys. What the little beaver does for building materials, the gigantic megatherium appears to have done for food. This huge extinct sloth seems to have had for its pleasing task to uproot and tear down large forest trees for the purpose of feeding on the branches.

The common snail sets forth to ravage our gardens equipped with one hundred and fifty rows of stout serrated teeth. The whole palate contains about twenty-one thousand teeth, while a full-grown slug has over twenty-six thousand of these silibious spikes. The wrelk has a ribbon-like tongue, contained in a proboscis, with which it bores holes in the shells of the molluscs which form its food. The tongue has strong, saw-like teeth on the edges, with rows of finer ones between. In some molluscs the tongue resembles a tesselated pavement, with a tooth in the centre of each lozenge-shaped compartment.—All The Year Round.

A Stranger's Mistake.

A Western merchant, who wanted to do some sight seeing and buy his fall stock at the same time, entered a dry-goods jobbing-house on Broadway, and accosted the first person he met with:

"Are you the proprietor here?"

"Not exactly the proprietor," was the reply; "at present I am acting as shipping clerk, but I am cutting my cards for a partnership next year by organizing noon prayer-meetings in the basement."

The stranger passes on to a very important personage with a diamond pin, and asked:

"Are you the head of the house?"

"Well, no; I can't say I am at present, but I've hopes of a partnership in January. I'm only one of the travelers just now, but I am laying for a $2,000 pew in an up-town church, and that will mean a quarter interest here in less than six months."

The next man had his feet up, his hat back, and a 20-cent cigar in his mouth, and he looked so solid that the stranger said:

"You must run this establishment?"

"Me? Well, I may run it very soon. At present I am the bookkeeper, but I am expecting to go into a church choir with the old man's darling, and become an equal partner here."

The stranger was determined not to make another mistake. He walked around until he found a man with his coat off and busy with a case of goods, and he said to him:

"The porters are kept pretty busy in here, I see?"

"Yes," was the brief reply.

"But I suppose you are planning to invest in a gospel hymn-book and sing the old man out of an eighth interest, aren't you?"

"Well, no, not exactly," was the quiet reply; "I'm the old man himself."

And all the stranger said, after a long minute spent in looking the merchant over, was:

"Well, darn my buttons!"

Carelessness of Lady Shoppers.

In a Dundas street dry-goods store three ladies were purchasing goods side by side. One of them hung her umbrella by the handle on the edge of the counter and went to another part of the establishment. One of those who still remained laid her purse on the counter, and while making her purchases it was accidentally shoved into the folds of the upturned umbrella. When the clerk tore off his check and the lady reached for her pocket-book it was gone. She had just laid it upon the counter, and, of course, the lady who stood beside her must have taken it. Nothing could be clearer. In the excitement which followed the first-mentioned lady took possession of her umbrella and walked out of the store, totally ignorant of what was within it. A policeman was called, and, amid much indignation and grief on one side and blustering on the other, the innocent woman was conducted up stairs and searched. Of course the purse was not found and she was allowed to go. Now for the sensational part of the story. The umbrella was taken over to a hotel, thrown into a buggy, taken home and laid away. A few days later the house was burned down, but the umbrella, among other things, was saved. A few weeks passed, and then one day it was hoisted and out fell the missing purse. The lady remembered the incident in the store, and on her next visit to the city brought back the money and had it restored to the owner. In the period which intervened the woman who had been wrongfully accused had visited the store daily for the purpose of ascertaining whether anything had turned up to prove her innocence. The story is vouched for on the best of authority, and it is literally true. —London (Canada) Free Press.

Smoking.

"Smoking is a custom loathsome to the eye, hateful to the nose, harmful to the brain, dangerous to the lungs, and in the black, stinking fume thereof nearest resembling the horrible Stygian smoke of the pit that is bottomless." So said King James in his "Counterblasts or Misocapnus." It must be remembered, however, that King James did not smoke, while the genteel poet Cowper, an equal authority and fond of his pipe, declares that tobacco "does thought more quicken and refine than all the breath of all the nine."

It happens that the lively Gaul, as represented by a small body of anti-tobacconists, has lately set up a society entitled "The Association Against the Abuse of Tobacco," and by dint of much persuasion has extracted from the French Academy a report, from which we learn that dyspepsia, irregular circulation of the blood, palpitation, pains in the back and the chest, dizziness, loss of memory, feebleness of sight and general stupidity result from smoking.

Against this sweeping dictum we must, however, quote the statement of Dr. Richardson, of hygienic fame, to the effect that tobacco as compared with alcohol is innocuous, that it does less harm than opium, and is not worse than tea.

According to our French friends of the newly-formed society, idiocy and death lurk in the bowl of the tobacco pipe, and this they aver, notwithstanding Lord Lytton declared that this insidious weed ripens the brain and opens the heart and makes a man think like a sage and act like a Samaritan. One side or the other may be, it does not follow that either must be, right. Meanwhile modern votaries of what Charles Lamb calls the "plant divine of rarest virtue" are at liberty to consider the entire question as to the use and abuse of tobacco, aided by the pleasant perfume of the much-maligned nicotian comforter.—London Telegraph.

Prejudice Kills.

"Eleven years our daughter suffered on a bed of misery under the care of several of the best (and some of the worst) physicians, who gave her disease various names but no relief, and now she is restored to us in good health by as simple a remedy as Hop Bitters, that we had poohed at for two years, before using it. We earnestly hope and pray that no one else will let their sick suffer as we did, on account of prejudice against so good a medicine as Hop Bitters."—The Parents.—Telegram.

Pipping Off a Miner.

During one of his intermittent visits to the Comstock Mr. Mackay accompanied a party of Eastern tourists to the lower levels of the California mine, one of which carefully selected collection of Massachusetts blue blood being a young lady from Boston who was refined to the top notch of culture. On arriving at one of the lower levels the gasping perspiring, wilted crew paused, and Mr. Mackay called the young girl's attention to a speaking tube which connected with the level above.

"Yes'm," said Mackay; "try it."

"Aye, aye," shouted a hearty miner a hundred feet above.

"What shall I ask him?" said the girl to Mr. Mackay.

"Ask him how he is getting along."

"How are you getting along, sir?" whistled the maiden.

"Aw-w—pretty well," rumbled the reply.

"And now what shall I say," continued the girl.

"Ask him if it's hot."

"Is it hot up there?"

"Hotter'n h—l," was the plain answer. The damsel gasped, but continued: "What else shall I say?"

"Oh, ask him how his family are," replied Mr. Mackay, who began to tire of the "pipping-off" interview.

"How are all your family?" asked the girl.

"To h—l wid ye; what are ye givin' us," thundered the miner, who thought some one was "joshing" him.

THE oldest specimens of timber in the world are supposed to be the dowel pins contained in the ancient temples of Egypt. These dowel pins are incorporated with the stone work, which is known to be not less than 4,000 years old, and are believed to have been made from the tamarask or shittim wood of ancient Egypt—a tree now sometimes found in the Nile Valley.

Lord Bacon.

Francis Bacon was born at London, Jan. 22, 1561. His father, Sir Nicholas Bacon, was Lord Keeper of the Great Seal under Elizabeth. Soon after completing his twelfth year, he went to Cambridge, where he distinguished himself. He traveled on the continent, and returned to England in 1579 on account of his father's death. In 1582 he was admitted to the bar, and in 1589 became a member of Parliament, and in 1590 Counsel Extraordinary to the Queen, a distinction almost without example for one so young. In 1606 he married Alice Barnham, the daughter of a rich London merchant, and the succeeding year was made Solicitor General, and in 1613 became Attorney General and a member of the Privy Council; in 1617 he became Keeper of the Great Seal, and the following January was made Lord High Chancellor, the highest civil office to which any subject could then attain. In the following July he was created Baron Verulam, and admitted to the House of Peers, and in 1619 became Viscount Saint Albans. In 1620 he published his greatest work, the "Novum Organum." He was accused of accepting bribes, and, though at first strongly asserted his innocence, yet he afterward confessed his guilt, and was sentenced May 3, 1621, to pay a fine of £40,000 and to be imprisoned at the King's pleasure. He was shown every indulgence, being sent to the Tower but released two days after, and the fine was remitted. He was allowed an income of £1,500, a sum equal to five times that amount at the present day. He died April 9, 1862. His works are numerous, the best known being his "Essays," the "Novum Organum," "On the Wisdom of the Ancients," etc. He is described as one of the most illustrious of modern philosophers. Quite a number of able thinkers and writers attribute to him the authorship of some of the great plays of Shakespeare. Lord Bacon left no children.

Haunted Me.

A workingman says: "Debt, poverty and suffering haunted me for years, caused by a sick family and large bills for doctoring, which did no good. I was completely discouraged, until one year ago, by the advice of my pastor, I procured Hop Bitters and commenced their use, and in one month we were all well, and I want to say to all poor men, you can keep your families well a year with Hop Bitters for less than one doctor's visit will cost."—Christian Advocate.

Waiting for His Mutton.

During the height of the so-called "Jingo" excitement, when men, and more especially women, were almost unendurable on account of their political vehemence, Lord Beaconsfield was apparently, at least, perfectly calm. Seated at dinner by the side of an illustrious lady he was asked in tones of feminine petulance: "What are you waiting for? What are you waiting for?"—the implication being amazement that he did not hurl England into war against Russia. "Waiting?" said he. "I am waiting for some roast mutton and potatoes."

Arctic Explorers.

Dr. Isaac I. Hayes, who was a member of Dr. Kane's party, reached, in May, 1861, a point, latitude 81 deg. 30 min., beyond which it was impossible to go. Although a number of expeditions have gone to the polar regions since then, that land reached by Hayes is the most northerly ever trod by any explorer up to this time. It is, of course, impossible to tell how far north the missing Jeannette and her party penetrated, but Hayes is at the head thus far.

"SHALL I help you to alight?" asked a city exquisite of a muscular country girl, who was about to get out of a wagon that had just come up to the porch of a rural tavern. DR. HARTER'S
(Endorsed and recommended by the medical profession, for Dyspepsia, General Debility, Female Diseases, Want of Vitality, Nervous Prostration, and Convalescence from Fevers, &c.)
GENTLEMEN: I was suffering from general debility to such an extent that my labor was exceedingly burdensome to me. A vacation of a month did not give me much relief, but on the contrary, was followed by increased prostration and sinking chills. At this time I began the use of your IRON TONIC, from which I realized almost immediate and wonderful results. The old energy returned and I found that my natural force was not permanently abated. I have used three bottles of the Tonic. Since using it I have done twice the labor that I ever did in the same time during my illness, and with double the ease. With the tranquil nerve and vigor of body, has come also a clearness of thought never before enjoyed. If the Tonic has not done the work, I know not what. I give it the credit. J. P. WATSON, Pastor Christian Church, Troy, O.

PAPERS are discussing the question as to whether vice-President Arthur can act as president during Garfield's illness. It seems to be the general impression that he might do so, but the fact that there is but little to be done just now, makes the question an unimportant one in the present case.

Dr. I. H. Jennings, of Bourbon, Marshall county, while attempting to cross the railroad track was struck by a passing train, and thrown about fifty feet. He was instantly killed. Deceased was one of the early settlers of Kosciusko county, and was much esteemed. He had recently moved from his farm to Bourbon.

The Fort Wayne News says: Willis Maier has in his possession, a daguerreotype, showing the principal portion of this city, as it appeared in 1849, on the occasion of the first balloon ascension here. Fred. Drake can be seen in the distance, delivering letters at the post office window, and Stroop's barn still looms up proudly in the background.

A young man named Edward S. Ransdell, employed as mail carrier in Indianapolis, was arrested for stealing letters. He was one of the oldest and best known mail carriers in the city. The accused made a confession and gave bonds for his future appearance for trial, It is said that evil associations were the cause of his ruin.

A young married man came to Connersville the other day, and purchased furniture to go to housekeeping. On the road home with the goods, he accidentally let fire fall from his cigar on the combustibles. The blaze sprang up fiercely and it was with difficulty that the horses were extricated from the wagon. The furniture and wagon were consumed.

ANOTHER company of tourists has been sent to Europe this summer, by the Indiana University at Bloomington. The party came near meeting with a fatal accident while traveling in the Alps recently. They had ascended one of the higest peaks, the Matterhorn, a difficult feat at any time, and were on their return down the mountain, when a stone became loosened, and rolled down the steep sides, striking Mr. Charles Gilbert, tutor of the University, on the head, inflicting severe injuries. The following from a Swiss paper of a recent date will explain the matter more fully: "Five American tourists ascended the Matterhorn Saturday night. On their return a rock accidentally dislodged and struck the head of Mr. Gilbert, tutor of the Indiana University, Bloomington, Ind., rendering him partially insensible. He was just able to move mechanically along. Nearly four hours were spent in bringing him to the first hut. Some of the party preceded and brought the doctors. Gilbert arrived at Zermatt Sunday evening. He suffered principally from loss of blood, and will be able to leave shortly. The guides were apprehensive lest if he collapsed before he arrived at the hut, the party would be frozen to death before succor could be obtained.

Auburn Courier

Local and Miscellaneous.

—Last week, two days before the paper came out, we were assailed on the street thusly: "What 'n h—l are you going to say anything about that affair for. I know a fellow who saw one of the boys putting it in type." We have made mention in several articles, within the past three weeks, that it was strictly against the rules of our office for anyone, no matter what position he occupies, nor what pedigree his sire may have had, to come snuffing around the office, after fresh news. And to make a long article short, the first fellow that we notice rubbing his Roman nose around the quad-box of a composing case, can prepare himself to take the "collar and breeches" route to the terminus of our stairway.

—We have a number of young boys, from eight to fifteen years old, who have become addicted to the habit of smoking. Auburn certainly has the most impudent and forward census of boys that tramps this great footstool. There is nothing more aggravating than the loud, cheeky, silly and self-satisfied air of a young knownothing—boys who never saw a photograph of the English language. They are scorned by their associates, and despised by men, who generally speak of them as a "freshy" or "a smart aleck." The walls of the corporation lines are bulged out from the pressure of of this A B C brigade.

—The following is said to be a sure cure for cholera morbus and should be kept in every household: Take equal parts of tincture of cayenne pepper, tinture of opium, tincture rhubarb, essence of peppermint and spirits of camphor. Mix well. Dose 16 to 30 drops in a little water, according to age and violence of symptoms, repeated every fifteen or twenty minutes until relief is obtained.

—While Fremont Smith and his wife were coming from the picnic Saturday, some fellow made an effort to run around him, when the buggies "consolidated," leaving the Smart Aleck at one side of the road with three wheels, a broken buggy top, a slim pocket-book and a charming country "gal." Gordon and his camera could have made a young fortune had they been there.

—Wouldn't it be well enough for our readers to compare the amount of original reading matter and news in the last two COURIERS with that found in the other county papers of the same date. Our contemporaries have had their little self-praise a number of times, and now suppose we let an inspection of the different papers decide.

—A young man by the name of Charley Schrader, working on the Wabash grade, was attacked by Hank Shull's Shepherd dog on South Main street last week. The cur rolled Charley around in the dust a short time, when a few kicks from a No. 12 cow hide boot satisfied his dogship, and he lit out for more desirable quarters.

—The fellow giving his name as Geo. Wilson, who was placed in the county jail for picking pockets at Butler, was bailed out last week and is now gone, the devil knows where. This is the last that will be seen of Georgie. He is out on bail, but it is cash, the county will be no loser.

—The men working upon the Wabash grade have finished their labor at this place and are now on their way to Churubusco, where they will put in a side-track similar to the one here. They did some splendid work, and all speak in flattering terms of the gang, especially the dumper.

—Several of our young men who imagine themselves of so great importance in society can easily find out how "much they weigh" by going into the country a week. On their return they would have to say, "I've been away." Hank Yesbera or H. Gugerli might miss them if they staid over a week.

—The poor management of the Butler people in allowing pick-pockets, chuck-luck banks, wheels of fortune and other gambling institutions to blockade the streets at the reunion, has thrown a cloud over these gatherings for the future.

—Rhodenbaugh's mule team and Roth's dray horses had a race down Main street Tuesday night. Have these fellows forgotten how John Brown got paid off for running his horse on the same street?

—Roy Gregg sent us up some choice cigars on the strength of the "baby puff." We hope it will be but a short time until we will be called to give him another "send off"—for some more cigars, we mean.

—The law firm of Rose & Hartman has dissolved partnership. The Republican says a "petition" has been built to separate them one from another. We smile at this kind of a division.

—A letter received from Chris. Baker, to his wife, states that he is improving slowly and will have to remain at Mt. Clemens for a week yet. His trouble is heart disease and liver complaint.

—Auburn is certainly a healthy town. We notice in nearly all of our exchanges that sickness prevails to a great extent, and especially among the little ones. We hear of but little sickness in this place.

A Curious Sight.

A BRILLIANT LIGHT IN THE NORTHERN SKY.

Last Friday evening upon the different street corners could be seen groups of people looking earnestly into the sky and each one wondering with amazement what "that little red light was." The majority of the folks held a convention, and passed a resolution which read as follows: "We, the peaceful citizens of Auburn do hereby unanimously claim that the red light in yonder sky is either a balloon, or, that the angels have awakened to the necessity of railroads, and that spark, as it appears there, is the same as the headlights used on our engines here below. And, resolved that it behooves all good citizens to be in their nest at this time of night." The convention adjourned, sine die.

It turned out to be a kite with a lawn lantern attached to its tail, held in the hands of Auditor Robbins' little boy, Bert.

The Picnic.

AN IMMENSE CROWD AND GOOD TIME.

The picnic held at Grove Bethel last Saturday is said to have been a big affair. The crowd was very large, and all seemed to enjoy themselves on the occasion. It was a most beautiful day for out-door sport, making everything more pleasant for both old and young. Nearly the entire Presbyterian school from this place attended, and almost every school for miles around was represented. No accidents of any note transpired, which is certainly one good feature of the gathering. Songs, speeches, etc., were the order of the day.

* * *

—While Fred. Yesbera was looking over the crowd at the picnic, to "see the best looking girl on the ground," his horses got astride of a beech tree. They were released, however, without the aid of a derrick.

The Butler Record looked huge last week. It was a "reunion issue" and contained forty-eight columns, being the same size of the COURIER. We expect the Washington news dealers made a stake.

—Deputy sheriff Frank Leas "lit out" Tuesday with a crazy woman from Fairfield Center, named Sarah A. Boyer. They took the south train on the Saginaw, and will have an understanding when they reach Indianapolis.

—We have our mind's eye on several middle-aged men who make a practice of arguing and criticising every public sensation that transpires. They are not what might be called fools, but they make fools of themselves.

—We notice that the Detroit Daily News is again delivered here by carriers. It is a modern daily and that is all. The Fort Wayne Sentinel or News, either one, can give it "twenty-five," and then discount it.

—Dr. Casebeer was talking of buying Hoff's team, and while he was looking into their mouths Frank said: "They are usht exactly seven year olt, with a few weeks different between both off 'em."

—The Anderson Bro's. large team of bay horses ran away from Tavy Baldock Monday. They were frightened by either Philo Lockwood, his bycicle or both, we have'nt asked the horses which.

—The small boys make too much noise about the little store on the corner. Now, the girls pass back and forth, four abreast, with "bang and bustle," and are not noisy at all.

—It took Clint Headley and four horses to take the Casebeer and Stahl families over to Butler, where they held a family reunion. They couldn't get Stahl(ed) for laughing.

—When you see a young man with his eye in a sling and one foot wrapped up in a cloth, put it down in your diary that he is either a base-ball player or an amateur bycicle rider.

—In the list of soldiers who registered at the reunion, Weamer, in publishing them, got about one out of every hundred correct. This is not bad "shooting," however, for Harry.

—When they have a base-ball game at Waterloo, the ladies of the town turn out en masse. When we have a ball match at this place, the ladies stay at home—en masse.

—Give Weamer, of the Butler Record, a credit mark for the assertion he made at Pleasant Lake, "Come to the reunion, boys; we're going to have a h—l of a time."

—Representative Moody was so anxious to see the Auburn ball nine beat Waterloo, that he went there without his dinner. He got left on two very essential points—game and dinner.

—Miss Ada Spangler walks from her father's farm residence to this place and return every morning to recite her lessons. Ada is said to be a very intelligent young lady.

—A young man by the name of Shaffer, his home is at Corunna, had his hand badly smashed, last Saturday, while at work on Reynold's brick yard, east of town.

—The men working on the stone gutter on Main street, got the center of it higher than the sides, and, of course, it had to be torn up and rebuilt.

—Through an awkward use of the lines, John Beard caused Culbertson's hack team to tip over the vehicle, breaking the tongue and otherwise wrecking the running-gear.

—Kendallville will have a soldiers' reunion on the 7th and 8th of October. Gens. Logan and Steedman are invited to entertain the crowd.

"Going to Bust."

THE AUBURN BAND IN A SHAKY CONDITION.

We hear it said upon the streets that the stockholders of the Auburn cornet band are dissatisfied with some of the talent holding horns in this organization. There are two or three fellows who will never learn to play Yankee Doodle on any instrument—unless it would be a cross-cut saw—who hang on despite the hints and kicks of the other members. The stockholders will take the matter in hand and lead these lads down and out,—by the left ear—and reorganize the tooters. Our citizens should take more interest than they do in the band. The boys are always at considerable time and expense and deserve a reward of some kind. Let our people chip in and get them a uniform and the boys will see that they are appreciated. It is true the noise made at practice meetings is not altogether acceptable to the hysteric old maid nor the average old inhabitant, but the whole town is not made of this kind of material—thank the Lord. We don't see anything so awfully annoying about it, only the base drum player—he makes more noise than anybody else, but he doesn't lead the band. There is a moral to this.

* * *

—The musquito is entitled to newspaper notoriety as well as other animals, when it performs cute tricks on the society girl. And,

"With head upraised and look intent,
And eye and ear attentive bent,
She carefully raised her taper paw,
And slapped herself upon the jaw.
But the musquito she thought there
Sailed, singing, through the evening air."

—There seems to be some dispute in regard to the time for opening the fall term of winter school. The date set by the town trustees is September 12, A. D., 1881.

—According to Vennor we are entitled to a snow storm about now. And on the other hand Vennor is entitled to a hiding place about now.

—It is said that two hundred theatrical troupes have commenced perambulating the country. Wonder if Auburn will be favored with one?

—Marshal Scott got his foot between a stump and the hind wheel of a wagon Monday, and came very near smashing it—his foot, of course.

—The sisters, at Avilla, eight miles west of this place, will erect a building for their use, which is estimated to cost the snug sum of $25,000.

—H. C. Miller had the misfortune to get his big toe under a plank just as it lit from a five foot fall. Hooker has a sore member, indeed.

—The cloudy appearance of the weather Saturday morning had a tendancy to keep a number of little cherubs from attending the picnic.

—The grub worms are a pest that farmers dread. They damage corn crops and we learn that they are now working in the roots of grass.

—Uncle Tom's Cabin has been converted into a menagerie, judging from the braying and roaring noise coming from the inside.

—Frank Culbertson now drives one hack team himself. Johnny Cool, the best horseman on the line, has been laid to one side.

—Our young and popular attorney, Thomas H. Sprott, wouldn't attend the picnic because his son refused to accompany him.

—Quite a number of our subscribers are paying their accounts to the COURIER. You can't come too fast, gentlemen.

—The corn crop is suffering from the drouth, and if rain should not come soon that much needed crop must be cut short.

—The faithful delivering horse at McQuiston & Ralston's store has a new harness. It makes the old dun step proudly.

—Os. Allen felt so good over winning the victory of the Newville nine that he cut a watermelon—at his residence.

—Sim. Tarney and Sherm. Hollister both received a car-load of melons last Saturday. The doctors smile a "great big grin."

—Our bill boards are covered with flaming pictures, advertising a show at Kendallville on the 7th of this month.

—Frank Kline wants to open up a correspondence in the COURIER. Well, send us in one, Frank, and we'll measure it.

—There are several hogs running in the south end of town, that annoy some of the residents. Hear ye, Mr. Marshal.

—The farmers are experiencing much trouble in plowing for wheat, on account of the soil being so hard and dry.

—Hank Bashelier has resigned the constableship and Charley Smith wears his star.

—The band gave Mr. J. P. Ensley a serenade. His big brother belongs to the organization.

—Young Jim McClellan is wrapping up cooking stoves and general hardware for Kib.

—The devil was the only representative of the COURIER at the Sunday-school picnic last Saturday.

—We hear that the Presbyterian folks will give one more "I'scream" social before the seas on closes.

Schaab & Beugnot have a large lot of trunks and valises cheap.

That Base Bawl Game.

SEVERAL CLUBS TAKE ACTIVE INTEREST.

Readers of the COURIER are aware that Auburn has a bawl nine, that has heretofore carried the title of "Os. Allen's club," but owing to Os's. pleasing demeanor and orthodox habits, he was black-balled, at the last regular meeting, and now the crew performs under the direction of Billy Little, who, by the way, is no slouch in the national game. The best sons of our worthiest citizens compose this organization, and are ever willing to go forth to do duty for our town upon the diamond field. They don't play for wealth, but scorn filthy lucre when offered for their excellent playing and good judgment. Their love for notoriety inspires them with a determination to win, if they have to pawn the captain's last shirt for transportation and grub. Last Friday they went to Waterloo, via the over land route, and played a game. The crowd upon the ground was large and the boys felt vigorous and started in with a "sure thing" of the biggest score. But about the time the ninth inning was ended they began to pull in their horns. They played hard until six o'clock p. m. and rode home in a lumber-wagon with empty abdomens—owing to the financial condition of the Waterloo nine. The score resulted thusly: Waterloo, 17; Auburn 4.

SECOND GAME—VICTORY.

Saturday the "Haw-eaters," of Newville, came over and got whipped by 14 lashes. They are a gamey set of fellows and use their under-pinning with great alacrity, but they did'nt have the boys to beat Billy Little's nine. They ate dinner at Sherm. Hollister's and the "Auburn Astonishers" put up for their hash. They got their supper at Newville, or at the half way house, we are unable to say. A photograph of this score would show the following brilliant array of talent wrapped up in these eighteen darling little bawl players:—Auburn, 39; Newville, 25.

JUVENILE GAME.

We were a little premature in stating that Auburn had the champion juvenile ball nine of the county. Sam. Puff had impressed this fact upon our mind by offering to wager "all he was worth" on on our club. Last Saturday the little fellows came over from Butler and everlastingly waxed it to our kids.

NOTES.

Ed. Long, the popular landlord at Waterloo, felt so considerate for our whipped nine that he cut a Watermelon into pieces—as large as he thought the Auburn nine would have strength to digest—and gave to each one before starting home.

Our friend Harter, of the popular fancy store, took the cake at Waterloo, but was the huckelberry in the game Saturday—as far as scores are concerned, no where else.

Tom. Scott tried in vain (poor fellow) to catch a fly between his boot legs. Tom. has worked too hard for a ball player.

The captain made one man Rush around and he got out. The "whole game" depended on that score.

Three or four of the Auburn nine would make good back-stops.

There is some talk of taking George Ralston, jr., into the first nine. He is said to be lightning on the pound.

The usual number of "cute" sweet sixteen youths, were present and made themselves prominent.

—The Lagrange Standard has put in a power press. That's what we ought to have.

Wabash Grade.

A PIECE OF WORK THAT SPEAKS WELL FOR THE BOSS.

The men who have been at work grading the side-track on the Wabash, between here and the Junction, finished their labor to-day. It is a master piece of work, and gives credit to the men employed thereon. They had more dirt than was necessary for the grade, and this surplus material was hauled into the bad piece of road near the hub-and-spoke factory, thereby donating to the citizens of this place over one hundred dollars in the way of improving this thoroughfare.

Accident.

ANOTHER WARNING TO THE THOUGHTLESS BOY.

As the morning freight was leaving the Saginaw depot Tuesday, a young lad named Asha Brandon, son of Ike Brandon, living near the stave factory, got aboard the train and when opposite his home jumped from the platform of the rear car. The train was under pretty good speed, and in leaping he was violently thrown upon his head and shoulders, dislocating the collar bone. We are informed that parents, in that part of town, allow their children to ride back and forth upon freight trains never thinking of the results which are apt to come therefrom. We hope that the accident of little Asha will cause them to see the danger their children are liable to meet at any moment, and act immediately.

Buffalo Sale.

A FREE EXHIBITION ON MAIN STREET THE 3D INST.

Next Saturday, between the hours of ten o'clock a. m. and four p. m., the sheriff will swing the hammer over the much talked about buffalo, until the bidding reaches two-thirds of the appraised value thereof. In the forenoon there will be a street exhibition. The animal will be decorated with flags and plumes, led by the wonderful Siamese twins—John Bunch and Todd Latson—under the entire supervision of their only sister, Shad. Somersaults and other gymnastic feats will be performed by the twins—providing the buffalo is out of humor. Everything is free, with the exception of the buffalo, which has to be paid for, one-third cash in hand, one-third in six and one-third in nine months, without relief from valuation or appraisement laws.

Listen, Readers.

STOP A MOMENT AND REFLECT OVER THE PAST.

In these days of exhausting heat and drought, when malaria and disease stalk abroad in the land, it will be in order to reflect on the dangers that surround us. Our neighbors and friends are being called to that mysterious abode beyond the grave. This has strong tendencies to prompt us all to reflect seriously on the great problem of life. We are drifting with the hurry and bustle of life. We see a hearse passby, and though we have a full realization of why it passes, we care not to worry our mind by brooding over the important lesson it gives to us. The lifeless remains of a citizen is hurried on to his final home and we think but little about it. We don't seem at all interested, while some will remark in this wise: "His chances are poor, he'll be planted deep," etc.—yet but a few fleeting days will remain and this plumed vehicle will call for us. The loved ones whose presence we now enjoy so much will soon be left alone, while we shall quietly and peacefully sleep through all the days and nights that shall come and go.

Flirtation.

GIRLS, LIE BACK AND LAUGH AT THIS.

Some of our exchanges are publishing an item which starts out, "The hinges of hell are greased with flirtation." Susan B. Anthony is the author of this production, and we would like to know how Susan is so well acquainted with the gates. She must have been there. It is true that chastity is the jewel of woman's character, which is essential to all other female virtues, and they can only retain it by proper action and thought. However, girls who have a common school education, and have been properly raised, do not, ninety-nine out of a hundred, flirt. Girls who indulge in this silly and unbecoming sport, are generally those who have been let go-it-as-you-please from the age of about fifteen years. A girl who will publicly flirt with a stranger, would not be noticed by a worthy young man, or one who has at all been drilled in etiquette. We know of some girls in this place who flirt with every scapegrace that will recognize their movements. While upon the other hand we have young ladies who are just as jovial and full of fun as "you make 'em;" but they are of a better class, and while they may be common in their every-day language and somewhat rude in their actions upon the streets, their bringing up is such that they would not flirt with a stranger any more than they would sever their right hand from the wrist. But to the point: Even if they should, through love or fun, flirt with the opposite sex, their good judgment would govern them so as not to go too far; and as far as greasing the "hinges of hell" is concerned, they never would do it. "Now, Susan, quit you're fooling," etc.

Berry Lowry, the strength of the Republican office, got his proboscus badly demoralized Sunday. He says he didn't feel like climbing the fence and thought he would "coon it." The top board broke, but the second one didn't, although he exerted all of his nose power to make it succumb. We are not informed whether there were any watermelons on the other side of the fence or not.

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

Charles Stockly was hanged at Batavia, N. Y., for the murder of John Welker, a farmer, residing near that place, April 27 of this year. Stockly sought Welker's 16-year-old daughter in marriage. Both Welker and the daughter rejected Stockly's proposal, and the crime was committed in revenge.

A New York telegram of Aug. 22 says: "A new clue to the resting place of the late A. T. Stewart is being worked. Some ten days ago a boy left a detective agency a crude oil painting, representing a scene in a lonely spot, with the words in one part of it: "Stewart's body lies here." The following note accompanied it: "This location is in Cypress Hill Cemetery. Be very careful in approaching the grounds. You will be watched. Don't be seen making observations, for they will see you and follow you." After consultation with Judge Hilton, it was decided to make a search. The cemetery was visited on Saturday, the spot indicated found, and four grave-diggers spent the afternoon at work. Nothing but a coffin-screw was found, though there appeared to be evidences that the ground had been dug up at the place indicated in the picture.

POLITICAL.

Senator Beck was interviewed as to the probable course of the Democrats in case of the death of President Garfield. He counseled the sinking of party feeling and the election of a conservative Republican to the Presidency pro tem. of the Senate, naming Henry B. Anthony as a type.

Greenback State Conventions were held last week in New York and Massachusetts. In the first-named State Epictus How was nominated for Secretary of State, and John Hooper for Comptroller, Dennis C. Fealy for Attorney General, Allen G. Woods for Treasurer, and J. H. Gould for Surveyor General. The Massachusetts Convention nominated the following ticket: Governor, Israel Andrews; Lieutenant Governor, Dr. George Dutton, of Springfield; Treasurer, George Foster, of Lynn; Secretary, A. B. Brown, of Worcester; Auditor, Wilbur F. Whitney, of Ashburnham; Attorney General, D. O. Allen, of Lynn. In Mississippi Gen. Ben King was nominated for Governor.

WASHINGTON.

Capt. H. W. Howgate was brought before the United States Commissioner at Washington to answer to the charge made by Gen. Hazen of embezzling $50,000 from the Government. Bail was fixed at $40,000.—Later investigations into Capt. Howgate's accounts make the sum total of his alleged defalcation so far about $70,000.

Red Cloud, after offering to give each Ponca family a square mile of land, asked the Secretary of the Interior to assign the surrendered Ogalallas and Brules to his reservation. His request will be granted when provisions and supplies can be sent to the agency.

A letter has been received at Washington from Capt. Hooper, of the United States steamer Corwin, sent into the Arctic seas in search of the Jeannette, stating that he had heard nothing of that vessel on the Siberian coast, that he had discovered an island near Cape Serdze and had victualed for the winter, if he found that he had to be out so long.

The Postmaster General has issued the following order, in answer to requests for instructions on the general subject of annoying postal-cards: "When anyone is annoyed or expects to be annoyed by postal-cards sent from any particular place, or from any known persons, he may direct the Postmaster at the point named to destroy all postal-cards addressed to him, or cards from any person named so addressed, and so far as the discharge of the duties of the office permits sufficient examination the Postmaster should comply with the request. The same request may be made of the receiving Postmaster. The direction to the Postmaster should be in writing, and should be filed for preservation."....Further examination and investigation of Capt. Howgate's administration as disbursing officer of the Signal Service leave little doubt that he has used $100,000 of the money of the United States for his own personal purposes. Like all persons who have made free with public funds, it appears that Howgate has lived in most luxurious style, entertained his friends most royally, and paid extravagant prices for everything which he used.

A Washington dispatch to the Chicago Times says that Capt. Howgate's embezzlement bids fair to show up $400,000 on the books. The Attorney General has caused him to be rearrested and held in $90,000 bail. Gen. Hazen believes that Howgate has for four years appropriated to his own use about one-fourth of the signal-service fund, over which he had absolute control. His private yacht on the Potomac was actually constructed with Government money in the back yard of the signal office. His method of securing signatures of blank vouchers was audacious enough to entitle him to a premium. He owns real estate in Florida, Virginia and the District of Columbia, and is known to hold large quantities of stocks, from which the public treasury may possibly realize something.

GENERAL.

Lieut. Ray, in command of the Point Barrow Arctic Expedition, has reported to Gen. Hazen that the expedition had reached latitude 45 deg. 19 min. 59 sec., longitude 136 deg. 44 min. 45 sec. on the 28th ult., all in excellent health and condition. The expedition encountered light baffling winds from the 21st to the 28th of July.... Ex-Minister Noyes, who has arrived from France, says there is but little talk about the De Lesseps canal scheme, and that the stock was not placed among the large bankers.... Three-fourths of the town of Yale, in British Columbia, has been burned. Loss estimated at $400,000.

Secretary Windom has notified the holders of the outstanding 5 per cent. registered bonds maturing the 1st of October that the Treasury Department will redeem such bonds without rebate of interest. Secretary Windom explains that he has taken this course because he thinks that it is as well to pay now as at any later time.

H. O. Armour, of New York, wants the public to understand that there is no corner in August wheat, but that a shortage equal to our entire export of last year has brought prices to a fair level. He thinks corn will fall below an average crop by 300,000,000 to 400,000,000 bushels....Completed reports of the condition of the crops and the harvest prospects throughout the world are being published in London. From these reports we see that, except in Austria, Hungary and Holland, the harvest will be below average—in France slightly below; in Great Britain about 10 per cent. below. Wheat is reported good in Germany, and barley very good in Russia. The harvest in Spain will be poor, while in Italy and Belgium nearly all the crops are much below the average. In the Danubian provinces of Turkey, from which Great Britain draws largely, the cereal crops as a whole are good.

Col. W. A. Cook, as special attorney for the Government, on behalf of the United States, brought civil suit against Capt. H. W. Howgate to recover $101,257, the amount of his defalcation, under the plea that he had left the District. Writs of attachment on his real and personal property were issued and served. ....George W. Riggs, the well-known, Washington banker, died last week aged 60 years.

FOREIGN.

Advices from San Domingo to the 2d inst. state that on July 29 emissaries of the Government discovered the hiding-place of Jons, Ramon, Perez and Julius Fras, and three wounded officers belonging to the party of Gen. Alvarez. On the afternoon of the same day all were shot in the cemetery of San Domingo City, notwithstanding the intercession of the diplomatic corps and the ecclesiastical body. An immense crowd witnessed the execution from the fortress wall. The diplomatic corps again asked in vain for the pardon of nine more adherents of Alvarez who had been condemned to be shot, and eight of the number were shot that day.

The dynamite fiend is abroad in Switzerland. The Grand Council of Zurich has prohibited the holding of a Socialist Convention there. The Socialists have appealed from the Council's decision to the Federal Tribunal. And now the members of the Federal Tribunal are threatened with destruction by dynamite if their decision is not favorable to the Socialists. Not only that, but they have threatened to blow up half of Switzerland, and begin there a conflagration that will burn up the world.

The Czar is reported to be devoting his attention to military matters. French election returns show that 364 deputies have been re-elected, the whole number being 483. The Republicans have been the principal gainers. The fact that the Bonapartist candidates were defeated in Corsica is significant, and L'Ordre, the journal of that party, admits that Conservatives of all shades have suffered a disastrous defeat.... A letter from Mazatlan, Mexico, gives the following details of the explosion there: One hundred and fifty pounds of powder blew up. The first day thirty corpses were removed, and the following six days four or five daily, when the authorities interdicted further removals, considering the work dangerous. All the windows in the town were demolished.

PRESIDENT GARFIELD.

Washington, Aug. 26.

The President is growing weaker, and it is expected that the end is nigh. Hope still remains in the breasts of those nearest him, but it is the hope which exists as long as a spark of life remains in the prostrate form. The patient is losing strength, and the liquid nourishment administered seems to have no strengthening effect whatever. His mind wandered nearly all of yesterday. The trouble appears to arise from the condition of the swollen parotid gland. The pus has accumulated in at least half a dozen cells in addition to the one in which the incision was made on Wednesday, and the inflammation is spreading, it is feared, in the direction of the brain. All these indications point to blood-poisoning. One who is in a position to know says that the pus which flows from the wound is no longer of a healthy character, but has become thin and watery; that it is the exception now when the President's mind is clear, and that for a greater portion of the time his mind is in a wandering, partially-stupid, condition; that there is no longer hardly a possibility that he can live, and that the final result, it is feared, may be expected Saturday or Sunday. He has vitality enough, it is believed, to last at least forty-eight hours. Mrs. Garfield, either blinded by her hope or misguided by the physicians, has not until within a few hours realized that the President was in so low a state, or that it was possible that he would die. She was very much overcome when informed how very low he was, and that the physicians feared the worst. Blaine's midnight dispatch is almost hopeless. The only hope he has is in the fact that the stomach retains a small quantity of liquid food. Beside that, all is dark. The President has lost, not gained; bad symptoms have appeared. The swollen gland is red and angry. Other symptoms excite alarm. The mind is wandering and somewhat beclouded. His strength is failing. That is the startling story.

The King of Beasts.

A recent traveler in Central Africa says: "Lions are one of the dangers between Zanzibar and the great lakes. They sometimes hunt game in packs of six to eight. Some animals show fight against them successfully. Lions never venture to attack the adult elephant, and even avoid the buffalo, unless they are more than two to one. In general they do not attack caravans, and never in day-time. At most a hungry lion may spring upon and carry off a straggler while passing through the brakes and jungles. But it is otherwise at night. When lions scent the caravan from afar, particularly if it contains goats or beasts of burden, they approach and announce their vicinity by terrific roars. Nevertheless, in a well-inclosed camp there is no danger; the lions never attempt to clear the obstacles, and marksmen from behind the palisades can pick them off with almost unfailing aim. There is danger only when the camp is not completely inclosed, or when those inside go out to attack them."

"Be jabers," said Patrick O'Rafferty, as he was reading about a case of suicide, "be jabers, if iver I take me own life it will be wid chloroform."

"Niver do the loike of that, Pat," said Mrs. O'Rafferty, "for yer inimies will bring it up agin ye afterward as long as ye live."

"I know all that, but little I care. It's the bist way to do; for ye see ye jist dose off, and ye don't aven know ye are dead till ye wake up and rade it in the papers."

"That's true," said Mrs. O'Rafferty, solemnly, and the subject was dropped.

THE FAMILY DOCTOR.

Sir Isaac Newton wrote to a medical friend, who inquired how he managed to retain health, in these words: "Ah, my dear doctor, you have a better opinion of your lazy friend than he had of himself. Morpheus is my best companion, without eight or nine hours' sleep your correspondent is not worth a scavenger's purse."

For dyspepsia.—One-half pound carbonate soda, one ounce bismuth, one ounce pepsin, one-half ounce Jamaica ginger. Add one quart of water, cork tight. Shake well before using. Dose one tea-spoonful after eating. Be careful about diet, eating no grease or rich sauce till the stomach regains its strength. An exchange says a lady who had suffered many years was given up to die, by what three physicians pronounced cancer of the stomach, and this prescription cured her.

Whooping Cough.—We have received from an estimable gentleman, who has tried it successfully with two of his children who had whooping cough very badly, a recipe recommended by a lady which acts like a charm. In the case of his own children they were relieved of their troublesome companion completely in nine days, and, since it can do no harm, mothers may try the remedy with impunity. The following is the recipe: Five teaspoonfuls tincture asafœtida, five teaspoonfuls sweet oil, twelve teaspoonfuls table sirup; should be administered in doses of one teaspoonful each, three or four times a day.

Treatment of Burns.—The best application for a burn is a liniment made of lime-water and oil, beaten together until it looks like butter melted to dress vegetables for the table. It matters not whether common lime or the chloride of lime is used, and either sweet or linseed oil will answer. Wrap the burned part in fine linen covered with this mixture, and cover thickly on the outside with raw cotton to exclude the air. Open it but once in twenty-four hours, and then carefully soap off the rag with lime-water and oil, so as not to injure the tender skin that may be forming on the wound. Bathe well with the liniment, and put on a clean dressing of rags wet with the liniment, and cover with cotton as at first. Where lime cannot be had, the next-best dressing we know of is soot mixed with lard, well melted and strained to get out the particles of soot. In this case you may first use strong alum water to assuage the pain, and then put on a plaster of the above. In any case, over the rags put raw cotton, to exclude the air and keep the part from being rubbed.

The Want of the Lungs.—While the ordinary lungs of an adult may hold about six quarts, it does not follow that each breath contains that amount, but about one pint. This arrangement implies the constant action of the air in purification of the blood, the primary object of breathing. Each contraction of the heart forces two or three ounces of blood to the lungs for the purpose, the refuse, after the combustion of the waste, being in part carbonic gas, a deadly poison to the lungs but safe for the stomach. By estimate the amount absolutely needed that the blood may be well purified is from seven to ten ten cubic feet each minute for an adult. And since this gas is heavier than air and is diffusial, it is needful to have open doors that it may pass into the cellar, like water, there to be absorbed by a tub of water and the like. Do we secure this supply in all of our sleeping rooms? An estimate of the capacity of such a room divided by 4,000 cubic feet, or the amount needed by an adult for the night, will determine the matter. If two occupy the room, 8,000 is the divisor. How large a room will hold 8,000 cubic feet? Not less than one twenty feet in its dimensions.—Dr. J. H. Hanaford.

Prentiss' Eloquence.

As an evidence of Sargent S. Prentiss' great eloquence, I may be allowed the narration of an incident in the life of this remarkable man. In 1844, in company with John Bell, of Tennessee, William C. Dawson, and Chief Justice Lumpkin, of Georgia, I met at a dinner-table at Newark, N. J., a distinguished gentleman, who shall be nameless, who was far advanced in years. During the dinner a lady present said to me: "I believe you are acquainted with the great Southern orator, Mr. Prentiss?" On being answered in the affirmative, she added: "I was tempted once in this city to go and hear him make a political speech, and I consider it an era in my life."

"Did you ever hear him, Judge Lumpkin?" asked the aged gentleman above alluded to.

"I never did," was the Judge's reply.

"Then, sir," continued this gentleman, "you should seek an opportunity to do so, for certainly he is the great master of modern eloquence. I had heard and read much in the current news of the day in relation to his ability, and could scarcely believe that heaven had vouchsafed such powers to any man as were ascribed to him. I was discourteous enough to laugh at my lady friend there who asserted that he had held her spell-bound for three hours. I was incredulous as to the existence of any human power being such as to enchain my attention for so long a time, and I was tempted to go for once to a political meeting to hear this man from the woods of the West. I found an immense concourse present. There were at least 1,000 ladies seated all around the rostrum in the open air, just where you have been speaking to-day. I wished to be near the speaker, and pushed my way, with the privilege of age, through the throng, until, reaching a convenient distance, I found standing room. It was just as Mr. Prentiss rose to speak, I took out my watch to time him. The cheering was vociferous, and I failed to hear his commencement, and I started to replace my watch in my pocket. I was arrested by a most startling thrill of words, and stopped to listen. And I did listen with an attention and interest I had never given to an orator before. So intense was my interest that every faculty, every feeling, was concentrated upon the man and the wonderful flow of burning words. It seemed the incarnation of eloquence. There was a witchery in his words, clothed in tones so mellifluous that they not only enraptured but stabbed the heart, and I lost the consciousness of passing time, and, when he closed I found my hands holding my watch at the pocket's mouth, waiting the power to replace it. I looked at it and found I had been listening for more than three hours, and though over 70 years of age, I felt no fatigue. A friend, a clergyman, who had followed me into the crowd, stood pale and agitated looking at the man after he was seated. As I approached him he exclaimed: 'Will you ever again doubt that God inspires man?'"—Philadelphia Times.

Stubborn Integrity.

A dispute from a singular cause took place at the office of a banker in the Chaussee d'Antin, Paris. Mr. Benjamin F——, the cashier, who has filled that office for the last twenty-five years, was at his post, when a collecting clerk, named Pierre Doulley, presented himself with a draft for 10,000 francs, drawn by a London banker. The notes were counted out, and the man left the place. In a few hours after Doulley returned, and, addressing himself to the cashier, said:

"There is a little mistake between us; there is a difference of 1,000 francs in our account."

"I never make mistakes," replied the cashier, indignantly; "for twenty-five years my balance has always been correct to a sou."

"But the error," said Doulley, "is against yourself, as you have given me 1,000 francs too much; I am as honest a man as you are—I have been employed as collecting-clerk for thirty-five years in the same house. There is your note. I will not take it."

"Insolent fool!" cried the cashier; I regard any man as an enemy who wishes to prove to my employer that I am capable of making a mistake. Take the note or I will turn you out of the place."

Pierre Doulley was not to be thus repelled, and from words the parties came to blows; but the clerks of the house hastened to separate them. The cashier, not wishing to avow an error, which he would have regarded as a stain on his long-established reputation for correctness, was fain to put up with the loss of the note; and Pierre Doulley carried the 1,000 franc note to the Mayor of the arondissement, to be distributed among the poor.

Electricity as a Propeller of Boats.

Another new application of electricity as a motor has been experimented in at Paris. M. G. Brouve, a well-known electrician, has devised a method of applying the electrical current to the propulsion of a boat, and the results have been eminently satisfactory. The experiments have been made on the Seine on several occasions with a small boat containing from two to six persons. The boat has five and a half meters long, one and a fifth broad, and weighs eighty kilogrammes. M. Trouve's electric motor consisted of a Siemens coil, which, by a simple but ingenious arrangement is made to transmit its power to a three-bladed screw at the stern of the boat. The motor itself is fixed on the upper part of the rudder, which it follows in its movements, as does also the screw. The motor, with its accessories, does not weigh more than five kilogrammes. In the center of the boat are arranged two bichromate of potassium batteries of six elements each, and with a total weight of twenty-four kilogrammes. The two batteries may be employed together or separately, and at night while the one is driving the screw, the other may be used for lighting purposes. M. Trouve's apparatus may be adapted to any boat, and there seems no reason whatever why it might not be so modified as to be applicable to vessels of much larger dimensions than that experimental one, which sailed against the current at the rate of one metre per second, and with it at the rate of two and a half metres. Experiments in navigation by electricity were made on the Neva in 1849 by Jacobi, but the method adopted had so many drawbacks as to be practically useless.—Pall Mall Gazette.

Simple Remedies for Emergencies.

Very few young mothers are able to control their nerves so completely as to keep from being startled when confronted with a cut finger with dripping blood and the loud cries which announce a catastrophe. Sometimes she cannot collect her thoughts sufficiently to recall any of the good remedies with which she is acquainted. One way to avoid this is to write out a list of help in trouble, and tack it upon the door of your room, after the manner of hotel regulations.

There is nothing better for a cut than powdered resin. Get a few cents' worth of resin, pound it until it is fine, and put it in an empty, clean pepper or spice box with perforated top; then you can easily sift it out on the cut; put a soft cloth around the member and wet with water once in a while. It will prevent inflammation and soreness. In doing up a burn the main point is to keep the air from it. If sweet oil and cotton are not at hand take a cloth and spread dry flour over it and wrap the burned part in it. It is always well to have some simple remedies in the house where you can get them without a moment's loss of time; a little bottle of peppermint in case of colic, chlorate of potash for sore throat, pepsin for indigestion, and a bottle of brandy. Have them arranged so that you can go to them in the dark and reach the right remedy, but be sure you never do it, even if you know they have not been distributed. Always light a lamp or the gas, and make sure you have what you are after. Remember that pistols are always loaded, and that poison may be placed in place of peppermint.

Paper.

It is estimated that nearly 2,000,000,000 pounds of paper is produced annually, one-half of which is used for printing, a sixth for writing, and the remainder is coarse paper for packing and other purposes. The United States alone produces yearly 200,000 tons of paper, averaging seventeen pounds per head for its population. The Englishman comes next, with about twelve pounds per head; the educated German takes eight; the Frenchman seven pounds; while the Italian, Spaniard and Russian take respectively three pounds, one and one-half pounds, and one pound annually. The consumption of paper being roughly in proportion to the education and intellectual and political activity of the people.

SCRAPS OF SCIENCE.

The labors of the Seismological Society of Japan have established the fact that there is a chronic center of disturbance within a radius of a few miles from Yokohama.

It has been computed that the power of the steam engines of England would suffice to raise from the quarries and place in position all the stone of the Great Pyramid in eighteen hours.

Experiments have been made with compressed gunpowder, made to fit the drill-holes and cut into short lengths. It was found to possess many advantages over loose powder, among which is a saving of 40 per cent. in powder.

The evil effect of the electric light upon the eyes is due, it is supposed, to the constant changes in the intensity of the light, whereby the eyes are greatly fatigued. Little inconvenience of this nature attends the use of the incandescent lamps.

The rapidity of motion of the wings of some insects is almost incredible. It has been estimated that the common house-fly moves its wings 330 times in a second, or 19,800 times per minute, while the butterfly's wings move nine times per second, or 540 times per minute.

Messrs. Galloway and Abel have found coal dust to be an important factor in explosions of the gases in mines. A mixture of coal-dust and air is not explosive, but a quantity of fire-damp too small to produce any effect when mixed with air alone causes the mixture to become violently explosive. Prof. Abel's experiments show that any kind of dust mixed with air containing a small quantity of fire-damp converts the mixture into an explosive compound.

The first complete description of the two newly opened pyramids of Sakkarah, in Egypt, has been given to a Cairo institute by M. Brugsch. They are located in the desert west of Sakkarah. The galleries and chambers are covered with hieroglyphics, in which the two words "Merina" and "Pepi" occur as royal names. Mr. Brugsch showed the two pyramids to be monuments of the two kings, Pepi and of his son Horemsaf, of the sixth dynasty of Maretho. The sarcophagi still stood in their old places; but of the mummies only one was found—that of Horemsaf, deprived of its ornaments and robes. The pyramids were evidently plundered in ancient times. They are the earliest examples of royal graves in Egypt adorned with religious hieroglyphics. It is most remarkable that the Cairo Museum contains a tombstone erected to the memory of Una, an official at Kind Pepi's Court, the inscription on which stone refers to the building by Una of the pyramids which have now just been opened.

Despite the boasted power and intelligence of human beings, many things are doubtless familiar to lower orders of animals which can never be perceived by man, while a large part of the animal world may look upon things as very different from what they appear to us. Sir John Lubbock has just recorded some interesting facts concerning the effect of light upon ants. His conclusions are that these insects must have a very different perception of light and color from what we do. We all know that a ray of white light passed through a prism becomes broken up into a beautiful band of colors—the spectrum. To our eyes it is bounded by red at one end and violet at the other. But a ray of light contains other rays not visible to our eyes called, but not with absolute correctness, heat and chemical rays. The heat rays extend beyond our limits of vision at the violet end of the spectrum. Sir John undertook to determine whether the limit of visibility of these rays is the same with us as with ants, and in a series of interesting experiments has become convinced that they percive the ultra-violet rays which are quite invisible to us. These must appear to them as a different color, of which we can form no idea, while white light with this added component may not appear to them as to us.

Lemon Melons.

Mr. Joe Beasley, an experimental gardener near Columbus, Ga., has succeeded in raising some melons with a delicious lemon flavor. He make an incision in the vine a short distance from the root, to which he attaches a lemon, and, by means of absorption, the juice is taken into the melons.

A NEGRO in Bullock county, Ala., while raising a crop last year, slept in one end of a hollow log and kept his cooking utensils in the other end.

A DEAF mute at Raleigh, N. C., has invented a hat fan, which turns on the inside of the hat, and is said to keep the head as cool as a cucumber.

UNDER the new Khedival decree abolishing slavery in Egypt, domestic slavery in future will be rendered impossible. Families possessing slaves now are not to be deprived of their property in them, but no new slaves are to be admitted.

WILLIAM BERRY, of Cincinnati, was engaged to marry the widow Newkirk, and the day appointed for the wedding was close at hand. Mrs. Newkirk's daughter Clara came home from a convent-school to witness the ceremony. Clara had all of her mother's characteristics and the additional charm of youth. Berry transferred his love to the daughter and eloped with her.

WHILE a colored women of Long Island was watching a fishhawk, recently, a hornet flew into her mouth, which was wide open, stung the root of her mouth, then went down her throat and stung her internally. Her whole system was poisoned and for days her life was in danger, but she pulled through and will doubtless keep her mouth shut in the future.

W. W. GOODALE, of Brookfield, Mo., aged 77, is said to be the oldest locomotive engineer in the United States. He was a steamboat engineer on Lake Erie in 1832, and began running a locomotive engine on the Baltimore and Ohio railroad in 1834. He afterward worked on different roads, including the Norwich and Worcester in 1846, and was once sent to China in charge of some engines.

A WOMAN exhorter among the negroes of Georgia wears on her head a halo of burnished brass, which she says was given to her by an angel, who appeared to her, as a reward for superlative piety, and is the only only one ever conferred on a person before reaching heaven. Its possession, she claims, gives her miraculous power over diseases, and enables her to intercede effectually for sinners.

SINCE Gen Hazen took charge of the Signal Service Bureau, the number of stations for the display of cautionary storm signals on the lakes, and on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, has been increased by eleven. A great extension of military telegraph lines is now going on under charge of the officers of the service. In the Department of Missouri 250 miles of line will be built to connect isolated military posts.

A TRAMP was arrested in New York the other day, for stealing a loaf of bread from the basement of a private residence. The bread was inside the grating door, and the tramp hooked it with a long piece of wire. He had with him a long reed and an ordinary table-knife. With the reed he is said to suck milk from pails inside grated doors, and the knife he uses to cut bread when he gets it as far as the bars of a door.

THE Czar has a curious ornament on his writing table. It is nothing less than a piece of the foul bread—a mixture of uninviting and innutritious refuse—on which the peasants have been trying to live in one portion of his dominions. He was ignorant of the distress in the district until a newspaper published the facts, and now keeps the bread before him on a letter-weight that he may see what his people have been obliged to eat without his knowledge.

JUDGE GRAY, of Massachusetts, is a candidate for the United States Supreme Court Judgeship left vacant by the death of Justice Clifford, and has the support of Senator Hoar. Ex-Attorney General (now Judge) Devens is also a candidate, and will have the Hayes influence, which will not be a recommendation to Mr. Blaine, the New England member of the Cabinet. Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, is in the New York circuit, and is not believed to be a candidate.

THERE was a convention of the Palmer family at Stonington, Ct., Aug. 11. The street boys amused themselves by saluting every stranger as "Mr. Palmer," and they seldom missed it. Four hundred Palmers had registered the day before the reunion. There was a good deal of disappointment at the absence of Gen. Grant, who is a direct descendant of Walter Palmer's oldest daughter, and who had promised to be present a part of one day at least. Arrangements had been made for a special train to bring him from New York to Stonington. He was compelled to be absent, however, on account of the death of his brother.

SOME years ago an estimate was made of what three criminal brothers had cost an English community in twenty years. The account stood thus:

Twenty-four prosecutions	£ 191
Maintenance in prison	150
Seven years' transportation for one	100
Value of depredations	3,120
Total	£3,561

Nearly $18,000 were spent on this one family, and at the time the computation was made the eldest brother was but 24. Their depredations were estimated at $15 a week.

THE employment of female clerks was considered by the Civil Service Commission in Canada. It was deemed not advisable to employ them for this reason: It would be necessary that they should be placed in rooms by themselves, and that they should be under the immediate supervision of a person of their own sex; but we doubt very much if sufficient work of a similar character can be found in any one department to furnish occupation for any considerable number of female clerks, and it would certainly be inadvisable to place them in small numbers throughout the departments.

A WOMAN in Portland, Ore., has adopted a novel way to get rid of her husband. She is a believer in spiritualism, and stated that she received a communication stating that her husband would die a certain day in the near future. She so worked upon the poor man that he actually fell sick, and became nearly frightened to death. When at his worst she ordered her mourning clothes, and calmly talked to him about his notions in regard to another husband for her, and whom he preferred she should take. Finally, his anger overcame his fears, he braced up, and determined to postpone his death to an indefinite date.

AT Richmond, Chief of Police Fleming has destroyed $500 worth of faro and poker tools, captured in the recent raid on Stout's club-room. The law required that they should be burned in the presence of the Mayor, and he was therefore present, with several other gentlemen, to witness the act.

GEO. HAWKINS, of Shelby county, was lately relieved from the Hospital for the Insane on a thirty days' furlough. If he showed no sign of returning insanity at the expiration of his furlough his release was to be made unconditional; but the other morning he went wild and attempted to kill his mother.

AUGUST BERG, of St. Joseph county, had got through feeding a thrashing-machine, and attempted to jump on top of it. His head struck a beam in the barn, and he fell feet first between the cylinders. His right leg was torn to pieces and jerked out of its socket, until it hung to the body by a shred of skin. The teeth tore his bowels open until his entrails protruded, and his left leg was broken. Berg lived about an hour after the accident.

A CASE of most inhuman cruelty to an animal occurred near Kokomo. L. Ramsey, who lives in that city, and who runs a threshing-machine, was engaged in threshing wheat. He finished up the job in the afternoon and hitched his horses to the engine to move it to the next job, when one of his horses balked. He then tied a line around the poor animal's tongue and set three or four strong men to pull at it. The beast, of course, hung back, and the brutes at the other end of the line pulled the tongue out by the roots. The inhuman owner was arrested and fined $1 and costs.

THE Evansville Tribune says: "Orange county has a cave that, for extent, rivals Wyandotte and the Mammoth. It is about three-quarters of a mile from the E., D. & E. line and the same distance from Valeen. It has not been explored more than ten miles into the interior, but is believed to be twice as large as the present exploration has disclosed. In it is an abyss so deep that a stone thrown into it is five minutes in falling, so that the sound of its striking the bottom returns. The cave is very little noticed by the people in the vicinity, who, like those near Mammoth cave, don't seem to consider it anything uncommon, because they have become familiarized with it; but strangers visiting Valeen, and hearing of it, frequently visit it, and speak glowingly of its wonders. The entrance is very narrow, but is not long, and terminates in a chamber of only moderate height, but leads to vast chambers and labyrinths that greatly interest the visitor. When the E., D. & E. road is completed it is expected to become a great resort."

Making Texas Republican.

"A Democratic paper in Massachusetts boasts that 'Texas, the most solidly Democratic State in the Union, will soon have a school fund of $100,000,000, the largest by far of any State.' This looks like a large estimate of the value of the public lands; but its devotion to school purposes will destroy the boasted Democratic solidity of Texas just as soon as a new generation has been educated."

By this (says an able contemporary) we are to understand that the education to be given to the children of Texas, with the help of this splendid school fund, will make the children Republicans in their politics, and turn Texas into a Republican State.

Twenty years ago, when the Republican party stood against the extension of slavery into the new Territories, and nominated Abraham Lincoln for President, a simple, upright man, who believed in Democracy and was ready to devote his life to the maintenance of the Union, any man might well bring his children up to be Republicans. A child could easily be made to understand that the extension of slavery was wrong, and that the Union was not to be broken up because a political party had been beaten in an election. When men believed in these principles, and could show it by voting for such a man as Lincoln, they could without hesitation or reserve instruct their children to give their support to the Republican party.

But now things have changed. Slavery is gone. There is no motive of humanity that can be appealed to in favor of one party over another, and the natural relic of the war—the opposition to the solid South, which has for so long been a veil over many men's eyes—must die out; in fact, it has died out already. The country has entered upon a different era, and to make a child grow up a Republican at the present time, the old-fashioned style of education must be radically altered. He must be taught that democracy, or the rights of the people, should be curtailed; that the country is in need of a more arbitrary control than seemed good to the men who made the constitution, and, above all, he must thoroughly understand that common honesty, though necessary in the other affairs of life, affords no fundamental rule for politics. Will the extended system of public education which Texas is destined to enjoy produce such an effect as this? We trust not.

But this is by no means all. To convert the majority of the future citizens of Texas into Republicans they must be made to feel that a Republican thief is better than an honest Democrat; that a man whose weakness and corruption are notorious and indisputable must be supported without flinching if he receives a regular Republican nomination for high office; that the bad points of his record and his character must be winked at or ignored or disbelieved; and that honest men must go to the polls and vote for a villain if his name stands on the Republican ticket, even if the opposite party puts up a candidate who merits the respect and confidence of all.

And finally, after all this, when the Republican party is defeated in the election, if by any means the result can be falsified and the Republicans kept in power, the minds of the young must be instructed to give their approval to the act. They must stick to their party, though the majority of the whole people be in this way disfranchised.

Such are the political ideas which the people of Texas must teach to their children if they would have them grow up Republicans. They are very simple ideas; but, unfortunately, simplicity is not their only quality.

The First Battle with Corporations.

Fifty years ago the Bank of the United States was a mighty power in finance and politics. Mr. Biddle, its President, was ambitious of still-greater influence, and he desired to spread it all over the Union, through agencies which he established. He succeeded in gathering around him many of the foremost leaders of that time, and, when the renewal of the charter was proposed, majorities in both houses of Congress promptly passed the bill.

Gen. Jackson had openly and formally opposed the renewal, and he, therefore, vetoed the bill. Not satisfied with this signal disapproval of that measure, he determined to crush out the bank; and, soon after his re-election in 1832, he removed the public deposits from that institution and put them in certain State banks.

This act brought down upon him the most violent opposition, and "the great trio," Calhoun, Clay and Webster, for the first time, were cordially united against the administration. A resolution severely censuring the President, and declaring this act to be unconstitutional, was carried through the Senate; but in after years it was expunged from the journal of that body.

This was the first memorable contest against corporate power. The President stood heroically against the seductions, the social and political influences, the wealth and the menaces which the bank was able to command. Mr. Duane, Secretary of the Treasury, resigned his office rather than execute the order to remove the deposits. Other friends deserted Old Hickory, but he did not move a hair's breadth from his original purpose. His courage increased, or, rather, it was more signally manifested as the opposition became fiercer.

Jackson knew what power the bank had exercised outside of its legitimate sphere, and he believed another charter would enlarge its capacity for evil. Therefore he took the responsibility, which after half a century can hardly be appreciated, of compassing its overthrow. And he succeeded, as he did in most of his undertakings.

The people rallied around the President. They sustained him against the great corporation, as they did against the nullifiers, after he had threatened to hang Calhoun as high as Haman if he persisted in his treasonable designs against the Union. He had fought their battles gallantly and victoriously, and their gratitude was great.

In the midst of the struggle Gen. Jackson wrote a letter, full of the spirit of Jefferson, his great exemplar, which is illustrated in the following extract:

"The ambition which leads me on is an anxious desire and a fixed determination to return to the people, unimpaired, the sacred trust they have confided in my charge; * * * to persuade my countrymen, so far as I may, that it is not in a splendid Government, supported by powerful monopolies and aristocratic establishments, that they will find happiness, or their liberties protected, but in a plain system, void of pomp, protecting all, and granting favors to none. It's such a Government that the genius of our people requires."

These truths made a lasting impression; and until the demoralization incident to a great civil war corporate power was restrained within proper limits. Its strides within the last twelve years, protected, strengthened and encouraged by Grant and Hayes, and by corruption in Congress, have been gigantic. Step by step, corporations have seized upon the avenues leading to possession of the Government. They put one President in by fraud, and another by the scandalous use of money. The present administration is virtually composed of monopolists and the champions of corporate power.

The contest between the people who are oppressed and the corporations that impose the burdens cannot forever be postponed. It is hastened by new aggressions. The greatest of opportunities is offered to a leader fit to conduct this grand cause of the many against the few. We have faith that he will be found.—New York Sun.

Art in Folding Linen.

The women of the ancient town of Anjou have acquired a world-wide celebrity for their art in folding linen for all purposes. Their huge linen presses show some chef d'œuvres in the way of folded table-linen that may be called marvelous. In a vast table-cloth folded into a trough, twenty-four sheep formed of Medina napkins are drinking, watched by a large napkin in the shape of a shepherd, and half a dozen doylies, fringed, taking the form of dogs. Others are folded in castles, towers, windmills, pitchers and miters of the larger size, which should be about twenty-eight inches broad and thirty inches long for dinner. The miter shape has already found its way to the American table. The bread is placed in the center, between the two highest points.

PROVED A SUCCESS
THE PASTILLE
Prof. Harris' Radical Cure
Trade Mark
FOR NERVOUS DEBILITY
BY YEARS OF USE!

A valuable Discovery and New Departure in Medical Science. A positively effective Remedy for the speedy and permanent Cure for organic weakness—the deplorable disease resulting from indiscreet practices or excesses in youth or at any time of life—by the only true way, viz: Direct Application acting by Absorption, and exerting its specific influence on the Vesicles, Ducts, and Gland, that are unable to perform their natural functions while this disease pervades the human organism. The use of the Pastille is attended with no pain or inconvenience, and does not interfere with the ordinary pursuits of life; it is quickly dissolved and soon absorbed, producing an immediate soothing and restorative effect upon the nervous organizations wrecked from vicious habits or excesses, stopping the drain from the system, restoring the mind to health and sound memory, removing the Dimness of Sight, Confusion of Ideas, Aversion to Society, etc., etc., and the appearance of premature old age usually accompanying this trouble, and restoring the vital forces, where they have been dormant for years. This mode of treatment has stood the test in very severe cases, and is now a pronounced success. Drugs are too much prescribed in this trouble, and, as many can bear witness to, with but little if any permanent good. There is no nonsense about this Preparation. Practical observation enables us to positively guarantee that it will give satisfaction. It has been in general use for several years and we have thousands of testimonials from patients, as to its value, and it is now conceded to be the most rational means yet discovered for reaching and curing this very prevalent trouble, that is well known to be the cause of untold misery to so many, and upon whom quacks prey with their useless nostrums and big fees. The Remedy is put up in neat boxes, of three sizes. No. 1, (enough to last a month,) $3; No. 2, (sufficient to effect a permanent cure, unless in severe cases,) $5; No. 3, (lasting over three months, will restore those in the worst condition,) $7. Sent by mail, in plain wrappers. Full DIRECTIONS for using will accompany EACH BOX.

(Send for Sealed Descriptive Pamphlets giving Anatomical Illustrations and Testimony, which will convince the most skeptical that they can be restored to perfect health, and the vital forces thoro'ly re-established same as if never affected. Sold ONLY by)

Jim Keene's Washerwoman.

"The fact is," said Jim Keene, the great New York rival to Jay Gould, as he relaxed his usual taciturnity under the genial influence of one of Sam Ward's dinners the other day; "the fact is, that no matter how clever and thorough a man's system of stock operating may be, there is always occurring some little unforeseen and apparently insignificant circumstance that is forever knocking the best laid plans into a cocked hat."

"As how?"

"Well for instance, about a year ago I was doing a good deal in Lake Shore, and counted on making a big clean up. I discovered, however, that there was some hidden influence in the market that was always against me. It didn't exactly defeat my plans, but it lessened the profits. I soon saw that there was some operator who was kept informed as to my movements in time to make money for his knowledge."

"Broker gave you away?" said several.

"Not at all. I never gave an order in advance, and besides, I used as now half a dozen brokers, and also gave 'cross' and 'drummy' orders in plenty. One day, while I was standing at the window of my up town place cogitating over this state of affairs, an elegant private coupe drove past, and stopped just around the corner from my door. It contained a richly dressed lady and a ragged looking girl. The latter got out, rang my basement bell, and was admitted. I sent for my man servant and inquired who the girl might be."

"She comes for the wash, sir," he said.

"Does she generally come in a coupe?" I inquired.

"Why, no, sir," said my man, very much surprised; her mother, the washerwoman is very poor."

"Just then my own carriage drove round for me, and as it passed the other I could see the lady eagerly sorting the soiled clothes in the coupe on her lap. This excited my curiosity, so I had my driver follow along behind. Pretty soon the coupe stopped, and the dirty little girl got out with the bundle and went into a brown stone front on Twenty-ninth street. The coupe then kept straight on down to Wall street and stopped in front of a broker's office, where the lady alighted with my entire lot ot soiled shirt cuffs in her hand."

"Shirt cuffs?" cried the entire company.

"Exactly; shirt cuffs. I saw through it all in a moment. You see, I am—or rather was—a great hand while at dinner, or at a theater, in the evening, to think over my plans for the next day, and to make memorandums on my cuffs to consult before starting down town in the morning. My washerwoman had found this out, and had been quietly 'coppering' my game by means of my cuffs for over a year."

"Well, by Jove!" said Sam Ward, pausing for a single instant in the sacred mystery of salad dressing.

"It's the cold fact," continued Keene. In less than eight months she had cleaned up over $600,000 and was washing my clothes—at least the cuffs—in an $80,000 house. She had diamonds and horses until you could not rest."

"You didn't make any more cuff mems. after that?" laughed several.

"Well, not many—just a few," said the great operator, holding his Burgundy up to the light. "I believe I kept it up about a month longer, at the end of which time I had raked in the washerwoman's bank account, and even had a mortgage on the brown stone house. It was a queer coincidence, wasn't it? But perhaps the information she found on the cuffs after that wasn't as exact as it had been, somehow, nor as reliable."

And the "King of the street" emptied his glass with an indiscribable wink that made Beach, who was short on Harlem, shiver like a cat who had just swallowed a live mouse.—[San Francisco Post.

Holloway's Pills.

Never dispair—something that never fails—Fever and Ague—To the sick it is of little consequence how they are cured, whether from a rational view of the disease or by the rules defined for the guidance of the profession, so long as the cure is certain and expeditious. To a suffering man the question on the relative merits of quinine or calomel is uninteresting. The faculty may wrangle and discuss their various theories, but Dr. Holloway's treatment dispells doubt ere the disciples of Esculapius have finished the first stage. Holloway's Pills are the only remedies which effect a speedy and radical cure without danger of a relapse. Read the advertisement elsewhere.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—None are genuine unless the signature of J. HAYDOCK surrounds each box of Pills and Ointment. Boxes at 25 cents, 62 cents and $1 each.

How Watches are Made.

It will be apparent to any one, who will examine a SOLID GOLD WATCH, that aside from the necessary thickness for engraving and polishing, a large porportion of the precious metal used is needed only to stiffen and hold the engraved portions in place, and supply the necessary solidity and strength. The surplus gold is actually needless so far as UTILITY and beauty are concerned. In JAMES BOSS' PATENT GOLD WATCH CASES, this WASTE of precious metal is overcome, and the SAME SOLIDITY AND STRENGTH produced at from one-third to one half of the usual cost of solid cases. This process is of the most simple nature, as follows: a plate of nickle composition metal, especially adapted to the purpose, has two plates of SOLID GOLD soldered one on each side. The three are then passed between polished steel rollers, and the result is a strip of heavy plated composition, from which the cases, backs, centres, bezels etc., are cut and shaped by suitable dies and formers. The gold in these cases is sufficiently thick to admit of all kinds of chasing, engraving and enameling; the engraved cases have been carried until worn perfectly smooth by time and use without removing the gold.

THIS IS THE ONLY CASE MADE WITH TWO PLATES OF SODID GOLD AND WARRANTED BY SPECIAL CERTIFICATE.

Indian Strategy in Business.

When the Carson and Colorado railroad treated for the right-of-way through the Indian reservation at Walker lake, Nevada, the Indians agreed to receive, in full pay, $700 and the free shipment forever over the road of any fish or other produce which they might wish to bring to market between Hawthorne and the Mound house. Walker lake is swimming with fine trout. When the new road reaches it, the Indians will be the bosses of the fish market of the state. They say that if Mr. Yerington had known how many fish they can catch in a day, he would never have entered into such a contract. The Indians laid their wires for this thing long ago, and when Mr. Yerington visited Walker lake they put up a job on him. They invited him to spend a day fishing, which he did, but gave him a bait which fish absolutely avoid. Several of the bucks also fished with him, some using no bait at all. The result of the day's toil was a small white-fish and a couple of half-pound trout. The savages pretended that the day's sport had been very fine, and got up a big dance in honor of the catch, remarking that the fishing had never been so good for years. In an unguarded moment he signed the first contract.

Is it Possible

that a remedy made of such common, simple plants as Hops, Buchu, Mandrake, Dandelion etc., make so many and such marvelous and wonderful cures as Hop Bitters do? It must be, for when old and young, rich and poor, pastor and doctor, lawyer and editor, all testify to having been cured by them, we must believe and doubt no longer. Our Neighbors.

ITEMS OF INTEREST HAPPENING HERE AND THERE.

A REMARKABLE RESIDENCE.—Two miles south of Wabash, on a hill overlooking the Lafontaine pike, is a house which is entitled to a place in the history of Wabash county. The residence is a plain, substantially built brick house, and is now occupied by Captain Early. To make a casual examination there is nothing whatever about the place to create the slightest suspicion, and for this reason the part the house played during the days of slavery is especially worthy of mention. Under the structure is a cellar, closely walled in with stone, which is entered from one end by a door. Near the center of the house is a wall which apparently forms one end of the cellar. It, too, like the others is solid masonry and no one would for an instant suppose that it served merely as a partition between the cellar proper and a sort of subterranean apartment. This house during the days of slavery served as a station on the underground railroad. Escaped slaves when closely pursued by their former owners came up through the state on their way to Canada, and as but few people had the hardihood to assist them in their flight those few provided every facility within their power. The house in question was built by Enos Thomas, now of Huntington county, and was occupied by him for several years. Many a slave who had escaped from his master and was hurrying to Canada, that asylum for escaped blacks, stopped beneath Mr. Thomas' hospitable roof and was by means of a trap door, covered by a carpet, let down into the secret cellar where there was no possibility of his being discovered. The innocent looking partition wall and the unbroken appearance presented by the other three sides of the mysterious cellar quieted all suspicion and no slave who was put into the place by the "section agent" ran any risk of being taken so long as he remained. The Courier became acquainted with the existance of this queer house only a short time ago, and now that all the past is so nearly forgotten there is no reason for keeping the fact of Wabash county having a station on the underground road secret any longer. It might be stated in this connection that the residence once occupied by the late Mr. Peabody, of Lagro township, was also a refuge for slaves undertaking to gain their freedom, and doubtless the two houses have been instrumental in helping a large number of colored people to Canada. The houses certainly furnish food for the curious and will amply repay a visit and an examination.—[Wabash Courier.

For some time past there has been an animal of some kind prowling around the grave yard and digging into the graves, but never reaching deep enough to do any damage. James Callender, who generally digs the graves, has been watching for the appearance of this nondescript and has at last had his perserverance rewarded. He describes the animal as being about the size of a Newfoundland dog and having a long nose and large feet with long claws; and from his description of it, one would surmise that it was an Asiatic Badger that had escaped from some menagerie and taken up its home in our cemetery. The animal has a large hole in the ground where it lives. Steel traps have been set for it time and again, but to no avail, the traps have always been sprung in the morning, but no signs of capturing the animal.—[Edgerton Herald.

"The Auburn COURIER of last week was a regular daisy. Truly the people of DeKalb county have no reason to complain of a poor paper, for in the COURIER they have a paper that is a paper."—[Middlebury Record. Our people are possessed of too much intellect and good common sense not to appreciate the COURIER. The paper can be found in nearly every household in DeKalb county and although we have by far the largest circulation of any paper in the county, new subscribers are added to our list each week, without any soliciting upon our part. We have a large number of republican subscribers who bite the margin of the paper while they read its contents—but what is home without the COURIER.

Benjamin Pierce, living near Sullivan, while at work in a clearing, the other day, was pinned to the earth by a burning tree that fell upon him. It was nearly and hour before his little boy could summon a rescue, and the poor man, then burned nearly to a crisp, lived but a short time.

The Wabash road has issued a time card, giving the time of all their connecting lines.

What We Want.

We copy the following from a recent number of the Free Trade Bulletin, a paper published in the interest of tariff reform: "We want a law which will benefit all—both consumers and manufacturers—by admitting raw materials substantially free of duty, and by making a corresponding reduction in the duties on articles manufactured from these raw materials.

We want a tariff which shall no longer tax all the people in America who work in brass or copper, and the still larger number who use the products of their work, to enlarge the gains of a few rich men who own the copper mines of Michigan. We would admit copper ore free of duty.

We want a tariff which shall not tax every carpenter and builder in America, and consequently every man who lives in a house, for the benefit of the owners of the forests which covers the hills of Maine, Vermont, Michigan and northern Wisconsin. We would admit timber free of duty.

We want a tariff which shall not tax every man who has a child's carriage or a plated spoon, or a bicycle, for the benefit of the owners of one or two nickel mines. We would admit nickel free of duty.

We want a tariff which shall not tax every man who lives in a house, or builds one, for the benefit of the monopolists who make American screws and realize enormous profits by the exclusion of foreign screws. We would reduce the duty on screws.

We want a tariff which shall not tax every man who rides on a railroad, for the benefit of a few men who monopolize the manufacture of rails in this country. We would reduce the duty on steel rails.

We want a tariff which shall not tax every man whose child goes to school and writes on a slate, for the benefit of a few owners of the slate quarries of Vermont. We would repeal the duty on unmanufactured slate.

We want a tariff which shall not tax every man who reads a newspaper, or a book, or writes a letter for the benefit of a few who monopolize the manufacture of wood pulp. We would admit rags, paper stock, bichromate of potash, free of duty.

The list is endless. The present tariff is a bundle of jobs, conceived in sin and brought forth in iniquity. To revise it, to simplify it, to make it fair and just, is what, here and now, we mean by Free Trade.

Our cause is the cause of the people against monopoly—the only monopoly which, in America, is created and santioned by law.

We do not war against domestic industry; we do not propose violently to sweep away vested rights. We do propose to break the bonds that shackle our industry and prevent it from competing fairly in the markets of the world."

Have We a "Revenue Tariff?"

Every man in any degree familiar with our present tariff and its operation knows that it is weighted with anomalies at once absurd and fraudulent. Many articles upon the list are protected by prohibitive duties which take countless millions of dollars annually out of the pockets of American consumers for the sole benefit of favored monopolies that do not employ, all told, a hundred working men.

By way of example, rice is subject at present to a duty of 85 per cent. Diamonds pay only 10 per cent. Now, will anybody tell us how the country would be ruined if the poor man's rice pudding was reduced to half its present cost, and the rich man's brilliant solitaire made somewhat dearer?

American copper mines are so well "protected" against competition that our manufacturers are compelled to pay more for the crude article than it is sold for in Europe after being carried from here across the Atlantic. Of course, scarcely a pound of copper is imported here, and the government consequently derives no revenue from the article.

The duty on fine laces is only 35 per cent.; the duty on the poor man's blanket is 100 per cent., making it cost him just twice its market value for the sake of a few radical mill-owners in Rhode Island and Massachusetts, who employ but a few hundred "hands," and grind these down to starvation point.—[New York Sun.

EXAMINATION OF TEACHERS.—The regular monthly examination will be held in the school room south of the jail, on the last Saturday in each month, until further notice. J. A. BARNS, Co. Supt.

Reunion of the Army of the Cumberland.

The thirteenth reunion will be held at Chattanooga, Tenn., September 21, 22. Fare has been secured on roads leading from Evansville, Indiana, Louisville, Kentucky and Cincinnati, Ohio, to Chattanooga at $10 round trip, if return is made on same route; $12 if return is made on either of the other routes. Proportionately low rates will be secured on all other roads connecting with these lines or terminating at this city. Large parties made up in cities beyond these points, north and east, will probably be able to serve themselves to better advantage in the matter of rates than could the committee on transportation located here.

Hotels, first and second-class, will entertain guests at from $2 to $3 per day, both on the mountain and in the city. Hotels, boarding houses and private families will be able to care for about 1,500 persons; and it is probable our visitors will more than double that number needing lodging, we suggest that whenever it is practicable to do so, visitors organize and come prepared to sleep in the cars that bring them, or bring camp equipage. The committee on entertainment has failed to secure tents from the war department, though timely and urgent application for the same was made.

Tranportation to Lookout Mountain, to the battle-fields and other points of interest will be furnished by liverymen and private carriages at reasonable rates.

How the Old Salaries Were Paid.

Between 1777 and 1784 the territory of Tennessee (really part of North Carolina) maintained a state government under the name of "Franklyn." In the old records—quoted once by Daniel Webster in a congressional speech—stand the following curious statements of the way payments were made in a time when the people had no current money:

"Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of Franklyn, and it is hereby enacted by the authority of the same, that from the first day of January, 1779, the salaries of the officers of this commonwealth be as follows, to-wit:

The treasurer of the state, 450 raccoon skins;

Clerk of the house of commons, 200 raccoon skins;

Member of assembly, per diem, three raccoon skins;

Entered into a law the 18th day of October, 1778, under the great seal of the state."

The well-worn burlesque of the "leather medal" suggests a vague reference to the times when skins were the only money.

The Popular Demand.

So great has been the popular demand for the celebrated remedy Kidney-Wort, that it is having an immense sale from Maine to California. Some have found it inconvenient to prepare it from the dry compound. For such the proprietors now prepare it in liquid form. This can be procured at the druggists. It has precisely the same effect as the dry, but is very concentrated so that the dose is much smaller.—Lowell Mail.

"Oh, beam my life, my awl to me!"
He cried, his flame addressing—
"If I adze such a love as yours,
I'd ask no other blessing!"
"I am rejoist to hear you speak,"
The maiden said with laughter—
"For tho' I hammer a guileless girl,
It's plain what you are rafter;
Now, saw love you just a bit,
What further will you axe me?
Can—will you be content with that,
Or will you further tacks me?"
He looked hand saw her words were square,
"No rival can displace me—
Yes, one more favor I implore,
And that is, dear Em, brace me?"

Says he: "It augurs well for me;
And seems to hinge on this;
And what is mortise plane to see

He kissed her lip, he kissed her cheek,
And called her his adored—
He dons his claw-hammer next week,

BELLA'S GLOVE.

"Well, girls, what shall we do to-day?"

It was on the broad piazza of the Baden-Baden Springs, one of the summer hostelries in the Santa Cruz mountains. Not a man to be seen—the long piazza was a vista of skirts. At one end sat the matrons, either doing some one of those numberless things called "fancy-work," or else retailing their household troubles. At the other sat the young ladies, some with novels in their laps, some idle. They were gazing listlessly across the garden to the disused croquet ground. No one said, "Let's play croquet." No, indeed, there had been a pitched battle on the croquet ground the day before. Miss Helen Winn had remarked that she named no names, but when a person was wired she did not think it fair for her to move her ball when the others were not looking. Upon this Miss Tillie Robertson had burst into tears, and said that Miss Winn was "a hateful thing." Miss Carrie Bunner, partner to her of the tears, immediately laid down her mallet with great dignity, and ostentatiously escorted Miss Robertson from the ground, saying, "There, now, Tillie." "Never mind them," etc., all of which was inexpressibly goading to the other side.

By way of showing the two seceders how unnecessary they were, two other ladies took their places, and the game for a while was conducted in the smoothest manner, and the conversation in sugared tones. From the fact, however, that they came home in four different directions it is supposed that something went wrong. John, whose duty it was to put away the mallets and balls after the ladies used the ground, related, on his return to the kitchen, that he found "them there mallets scattered all over creation, jest where them gals flung 'em when the game bust up."

No, although they had all "made up" since, the influences upon the whole were not favorable to that game which stirs the feminine soul so deeply. By the way, was the woman ever born who would not cheat at croquet if she got a chance?

"Well, girls, what shall we do to-day?" It was Bella Chester who spoke.

Now Bella had not been mixed up in the quarrel of the day before. If there was any one thing she did not care for, it was croquet without gentlemen. It is unnecessary, then, to tell you that she was coquettish. But she was pretty, too, was Bella—bewitchingly pretty. And yet she was not so pretty that other women did not like her, for they did. There are two kinds of pretty women.

"Let's go to the springs," said Helen Winn, "and watch them bottling the waters."

"Pshaw!" said Bella, "there's only an old man and a boy there. Girls," she went on, "I have an idea. How far is it from here to Santa Maria College?"

"About six miles," said Helen.

"Then I'll tell you what let's do. We'll have the rockaway team hitched up, and get John to drive us over there. It's vacation time now, and the students have gone. We'll have the monks show us all over the buildings, the mission church and everything."

"They're not monks," said Carrie Bunner, with an air of wisdom (Miss Bunner was a Catholic), "they are fathers."

"Well, I'd like to know what the difference is," said Miss Bella, briskly.

"I—don't—know," said Miss Carrie, weakening; "but you must call them 'fathers,' anyway."

"I'll call them anything they like," said Miss Bella. "But come, girls—let's go and get ready."

In fifteen minutes five of the girls were all ready. They had simply put on immense straw hats and very ugly dusters. Their gloves were veterans; their shoes substantial, but not beautiful. In short, they were attired as sensible girls should be for a ride over a California road in summer.

But the minutes passed, and Bella did not come. John chewed tobacco, and soothed his impatient horses as they flicked the flies from off their backs and pawed the ground. John was never impatient. A sweet and tender restfulness filled his soul when he was waiting for ladies. He had driven around watering-places for many years, had John.

At last she came. A simultaneous cry arose.

"Why, what ever has kept you so long?"

Suddenly Helen exclaimed: "Well, I declare! If that girl hasn't gone and changed her dress!"

"Yes, and fixed her hair!"

"And changed her boots!"

It was all true. Miss Bella had endeavored to shroud these treasons in her duster and hat, but it was useless. She was indeed a pretty sight as she stood there, with one dainty foot upon the step. Even John was moved. He reflectively spat on the nigh side, and made room for her to sit by him. Miss Bella sprang into the seat. John was better than nothing. And, as they spun along the road, she laughed at his well-worn stories, admired his skill as a driver, and when he turned to look at her would drop her eyes. And John? Well, he chewed tobacco. 'Tis wonderfully soothing, in any form, is the maligned weed.

At last the little town was reached, and John dashed up to the college gates in style. The ladies descended, crossed the wide and dreary-looking campus, and applied for permission to see the old mission church and the college buildings. It was granted them, and an olive-skinned Italian priest was detailed to show them over the place. He was gentle and courteous in manner, handsome in face, and there was a certain dignity about him which impressed even the giddy Bella at first. But not for long.

They passed into the old mission church, with its quaint statues and curious paintings. The peculiar realism which seemed to impress the Latin mind only revolted them, and the image of the Savior upon the cross, the blood trickling from the crown of thorns and from the wound in His side, only made them turn away in disgust. The strange frescoing over the altar, too, did not impress them; they laughed at the four-and-twenty elders seated around the Great White Throne, with "Sancto, Sancto, Sancto," coming from their mouths, while the monkish artist's attempt to represent the Deity shocked them. Then they went into the college, and saw the laboratory, and philosophical apparatus, with its strange electrical machines, globes and what not. From there to the library, where Father Augustine showed them the quaint old books from which dead and gone monks had chanted vesper and matin song. Huge volumes were they, of parchment leaf and leathern cover, with giant clasp and hinge; odd-looking notes in red and black, squatty and square (for they were Gregorian), climbed over curious staff-lines. The girls tried to make out the words, but the lettering was strange to them, and, had it not been so, the language would have been. So Father Augustine read out some of the lines, the Latin sounding less harsh in the mellow Italian way than they had thought. And then they looked at the shelves, where imposing tomes held between their covers the writings of the early fathers of the church—those early fathers who were so early that they have had to father all later creeds. Many were the strange characters, many the tongues in which these books were written.

"And can you read all those dreadful languages, father?" asked Miss Bella.

"No, not all," he replied, "but many; and Brother Anselm, who is the librarian, can read them all."

"Can he read that, father?" said Carrie Bunner, with wide-open eyes, turning over a curious looking volume.

"Yes, my daughter," said the monk, smiling, "that is only Hebrew. Even I can read that."

The library exhausted, Father Augustine asked them if they would like to ascend to the observatory, where there was a fine view of the surrounding valley. Miss Bella was the first to speak:

"Oh, girls," said she, "I'm tired. I don't think I care to go. But, since the father has been so kind, some of you go."

But the other girls were tired, too. And so Miss Bella, with an appearance of great self-abnegation, declared that she would go, although Father Augustine politely protested that the climb was fatiguing, and, if tired, she should not attempt it. But opposition only made her more determined, so they went together.

"Oh, what a lovely view!" cried Miss Bella, as they gazed over the fertile valley. "Oh, father, I'm ever so much obliged to you for inducing me to come."

"It is indeed well worth the trouble," replied the priest.

"Father," said Miss Bella, fixing her brown eyes upon him, "what is the reason you say 'my daughter' to Miss Bunner, and not to the rest of us?"

"Because," replied the priest, gravely, "she is a Catholic, and the others are heretics."

"How do you know she is a Catholic?"

"Because she bowed to the Host when in the church, which none of the others did."

"So I am a heretic, too, I suppose?" said Miss Bella, with a pretty pout.

"Yes," said the priest, calmly.

"Am I so dreadful, then?" said the girl, archly.

"No," he replied, flushing slightly, "but—that is——"

Ah, wicked Bella! you have pierced the priestly armor.

"Come, father," said she, coaxingly, "call me 'daughter' too. I feel as if I were a leper or something. Ugh!" And she shivered, and then laughed merrily.

"Very well, my daughter," said the priest.

Miss Bella was as pleased as is a victorious General. But she was not content. She leaned out from the window, and, as she did so, she dropped a glove upon the floor. When she turned the glove was gone.

Miss Bella could have hugged herself.

But all things have an end, and so had the tete-a-tete in the tower. Bella at last descended, and, as usual, found her companions cross through waiting, and, as usual, subdued them. And so they bade farewell to Father Augustine, thanking him for his courtesy, and crossed the campus to the carriage. And when they reached it, wicked Bella could no longer conceal her story, but told with great glee how she had made an impression upon the heart of Father Augustine. I am afraid she used a slangy word in speaking of it.

Carrie Bunner was horror-stricken.

"Bella Chester," said she, "I don't believe a word of it. Do you mean to tell me that he, a priest, would keep one of your gloves?"

"Priests are only men," said Bella, defiantly.

"Well, I don't care," said Carrie, "I don't believe it, so there."

And the girls climbed into the rockaway, which stood near the old church; the view of the college was thus intercepted.

John had listened meanwhile with much interest. He believed Bella. He privately believed that she could captivate any man, if she set her mind on it. And as he took a fresh chew of tobacco, and prepared to start, he indulged in much quiet mirth at the priest's expense.

Suddenly a black-robed figure appeared around the corner of the church. Bella's heart went down into her diminutive boots.

It was Father Augustine.

"I wonder if he heard us!" she said to herself.

The monk motioned to John to stop. He advanced to the side of the carriage.

"One of the servants," said he, blandly, doffing his angular cap, "has just come down from the observatory, where he found a glove. It was probably left by the young lady who was there with me. Which was the lady?"

Carrie Bunner's eyes sparkled maliciously. She pointed to Bella.

"Is it yours, miss?" said the monk, smoothly.

Bella mutely nodded. She could not speak. She felt that she was crimson to the roots of her hair.

He handed it to her. "I bid you good day, young ladies," said he, gravely, and he strode off toward the college.

John touched up his horses. He grinned, but said nothing. He was a man and therefore generous. The girls giggled and said a great deal. They were women.

And Bella? Well, Bella had wondered at first whether Father Augustine heard her.

She is wondering yet.

Tenderness of Old Hickory.

In the days of his youthful vigor, Gen. Jackson was fond of what Dryden calls "a knock-down argument—a word and a blow." But when age and office had modified his temper, he omitted the blow, though his words were still as hard as cannon-balls. Once, while President, he summed up the Websterian argument against nullification in this style:

"If this thing is to go on," he said to Gen. Sam Dale, his old courier during the New Orleans campaign, "our country will be like a bag of meal with both ends open. Pick it up in the middle or endwise, and it will run out. I must tie the bag and save the country. By the God of heaven, I will uphold the laws," he continued, striding across the room, brandishing a long pipe.

"Old Hickory," as his admirers named him, was but a tender sapling when his emotional nature was touched. The slightest reference to his dead wife caused him to bow in grief.

"Sam," he said, at this same interview, "you have been true to your country, but you have made one mistake in life. You are now old and solitary, and without a bosom friend or family to comfort you. God has called mine away. But all I have achieved—fame, power, everything—would I exchange if she could be restored to me for a moment."

Late one night, the President's Private Secretary, wishing to consult him about a letter to be sent off in the early mail, tapped at his chamber door. On entering, he found the President sitting, undressed, at a little table on which rested his wife's miniature, propped up against several volumes. Between him and the picture lay her prayer book.

The last thing the iron man did at night was to read in her book, with her miniature before him. During the day he wore the picture on his heart, suspended from his neck by a strong black cord.

The worshipers of Napoleon mention a delicate act of devotion done by him. On being elected First Consul, he jumped into a carriage and was whirled away to Josephine, that he might be the first to tell her the good news. But in nine years Josephine was a cast-off wife.

Gen. Jackson made his dead wife a living presence. At his death he willed his property, as he thought she would wish it devised, to his adopted son. The son had shown himself an unsuccessful business man, and a friend suggested that the property be secured to the son's wife.

"No," said the General, "that would show a want of confidence. If she," pointing to the tomb in the garden, "were alive, she would wish him to have it all, and to me her wish is law."

The woman whose wish was law to the stern-willed man had been dead seventeen years.—Youth's Companion.

"Let the Fool Remain."

Mr. Septimus Brightly was an aristocrat and a man of rank. He had held many offices of honor and of profit, and he deemed himself well worthy of all honor that had been conferred upon him.

This was the man who, somewhat late in life, took to himself a young wife. The woman whom he had thus chosen to honor was several years younger than himself. She was five-and-thirty and he five-and-fifty.

However, though younger, she was a widow, and possessed of considerable wealth. And she was quite handsome, also, beside being intelligent, witty and vivacious.

She had but one failing, one drawback, in the Honorable Septimus' estimation; she was Scotch by birth, and retained much of her native idiom and accent, of which habit her husband tried to break her.

More than once Mrs. Brightly had begged of her husband not to borrow trouble on account of her speech; but she laid it upon him most emphatically that he should not, under any circumstances, allude to her peculiarity of pronunciation in public.

For a time after this all went well. At length, however, the autocrat manifested himself. It was at an evening party, given by himself and wife, where many notables were present.

In the course of the dinner the lady called to a servant and bade him take away the fools (her pronunciation of fowls).

Said her husband, very pompously, and pointedly:

"You mean fowls, my dear!"

"Oh, yes," she returned with a charming smile; then to the servant:

"John, you may remove the fowls and let the fool remain!"

It is doubtful if he ever ventured upon a like experiment again.—New York Ledger.

FACTS FOR THE CURIOUS.

ABOUT two-thirds of a pint of air is inhaled at each breath in ordinary respiration.

THE skin contains more than 2,000,000 openings, which are the outlets for an equal number of sweat glands.

THE little sea animal called the pholas penetrates into the hardest rocks; and yet its boring apparatus is simply a fleshy substance somewhat resembling a tongue, soft and yielding.

MUSSELS swim by a slight opening and closing of the shells. They grow by fine particles which form around the edge. These lines are said to indicate the yearly growth of the creature.

THE star-fish is believed to commit suicide. Edward Forbes is responsible for the statement that a star-fish found in the Mediterranean, when attacked, if unable to defend itself, escapes by dropping to pieces. First the arms break off one after the other, then the disk breaks itself into fragments. Not being able to defend itself, as a whole, it kills itself in detail.

PHYSICALLY the ape is enough like a man to be his brother. The skeleton of apes generally, if we except the tail, has about the same number of bones as man. The proportions of its parts, except in minor instances, are also such as in man. Nor are their shapes, except those of the jaws and haunch bones, greatly different. The same rule of resemblance holds throughout all their structure.

THE effects of professions and trades on mortality are great, the term of life varying from 65 years 11 months for clergymen to 40 years and 10 months for lithographers and copper engravers. In England, according to the census-office statistics, the duration of life has been found most defective among the steel-workers, polishers and grinders, and next to these the life of the collier—that fearless delver in the bowels of the earth—is least secure, owing greatly, no doubt, to the occurrence of accidents in mines.

A CALIFORNIA hunter had occasion to cross a very wide and rapid stream. Among his dogs were a terrier and Newfoundland. The terrier refused to enter the water, and the Newfoundland tried several times to lead him in, by bodily plunging in and wagging his tail in a confident manner, but the terrier only kept further from the stream. At last, disgusted by the timidity of the little cur, the big dog rushed at the alarmed terrier, seized him by the neck and jumped into the torrent with him. The terrier yelled "murder" and "police" in the most expletive language known to the canine tongue, until the Newfoundland deposited him safely on the other side.

THE Icelanders are said, at one time, to have taught bears to jump into the sea and catch seals. The China birds are equally well trained; for at a signal they dive into the lakes and bring up large fish, grasped in their bills. In Greece the fishermen use branches of pine, steeped in pitch, and lighted; the inhabitants of Amorgos used cypress-leaved cedar, which served, when lighted, as a flambeau; and the Chinese fish in the night with white-painted boards, placed in a manner to reflect the rays of the moon upon the water doubly. These attract the fish to the boat; when the men cast a large net, and seldom fail to draw out considerable quantities. Anchovies are fished for also in a similar manner.

It Is Better.

It is better to look up and take pleasure in contemplating the good and great, than to find happiness in low devices and mean acts. It is better to tell the truth than to tell a lie; to do good than to do mean; to have charity than to be critically severe; to love your fellows than to hate them; better to lift up the fallen than to pull down those already up; to speak kind words than to hiss out the gall of bitterness; to keep pure than to reek with filth; to be on the losing side of a right than on the triumphant side of a wrong; to be honest than to cheat; to have honest piety than to be a flaunting hypocrite; to be industrious than to be an idle vagrant; and to be a fair and square human being than to be an uncertain quanity. With your virtue worship the true and you may attain unto greatness, but you can never do it in the eyes of justice by trampling upon, or by despising what is under you. The poor have as bright eyes and tender hearts as the rich. They are not below your consideration. Nature's willow will bend over them with the same grace and beauty they will over the proudest son and daughter of earth. Concerning being true in life, Grace Greenwood says: "Never unsex yourself for greatness. The worship of one true heart is better than the wonder of the world. Don't trample on the flowers while longing for the stars. Live up to the full measures of life, give to your impulses, loves and enthusiasms; sing, smile, labor and be happy. Adore poetry for its own sake; yearn for, strike after excellence; rejoice when others attain it, feel for your contemporaries a loving envy; steal into your country's heart; glory in its greatness, exult in its power, honor its gallent men, immortalize its matchless women." How much better to do these things than to go sulking and skulking through life like some dishonest cur! It is better and easier to do right than to do wrong. You go straight forward to the right, but you approach the wrong by devious and doubtful ways.—Quincy Modern Argo.

Planting Trees.

You can have no idea of the exquisite delight of a planter; he is like a painter laying on his colors; at every moment he sees his effects coming out. There is no art or occupation comparable to this; it is full of past, present and future enjoyment. I look back to the time when there was not a tree here (Abbotsford), only bare heath; I look around and see thousands of trees growing up, all of which, I may say, almost each of which, have received my personal attention. I remember five years ago looking forward with the most delightful expectation to this very hour; and, as each year has passed, the expectation has gone on increasing. I do the same now; I anticipate what this plantation and that one will presently be, if only taken care of, and there is not a spot of which I do not watch the progress. Unlike building, or even painting or, indeed, any other kind of pursuit, this has no end, and is never interrupted, but goes on from day to day, and from year to year, with a perpetually augmenting interest. Farming I hate; what have I to do with fattening and killing beasts, or raising corn only to cut it down and to be constantly at the mercy of the seasons? There can be no such annoyances or disappointments in planting trees.—Sir Walter Scott.

PRECIOUS STONES.

The Characteristics by Which Jewelers Can Recognize Diamonds Handled by Them.

A New York reporter interviewed Mr. Andrews, of Tiffany's. "How are you to identify unset diamonds?" the reporter asked. "Here, now, is a diamond," he said, holding up a flashing yellow crystal as big as a pigeon's egg; "that is one of the remarkable diamonds of the world, and could be identified anywhere. It weighs 125 carats, and is worth $30,000. While yellow diamonds are plentiful, yet there are few with a clear, decided tint like this; and it is peculiar in its cutting, from the fact that it has two rows of facets from the girdle, or largest circumference of the stone, to the table, as the flat top of the stone is called. In the ordinary style of cutting a brilliant there is only one row of facets between girdle and table. Here is a diamond," picking up a brilliant clear as a drop of dew and flashing with colors like a rainbow, "that weighs only two and one half carats, and it is yet worth $1,500, from the fact that it is of the purest water. A diamond as notable as this we could positively identify from its characteristics. Here is another," picking up a yellow stone, "that weighs nearly as much, two and three-fourths carats, and is yet worth only $275, because of its color. Yellow diamonds are hard to identify by appearance, because they are so plentiful. Diamonds come of all colors, pink, blue and brown being rare and worth much more than yellow. The pure white, free from stain or flaw, is the most valuable of all. Odd colors are so rare that they afford a ready means of identification. Here is a black diamond," he said, holding up a large brilliant that oddly combined perfect transparency with a blackish tint; "this is one of the largest and best black diamonds in the world. It weighs five carats, and is worth $2,500. Now, here," picking up a beautiful diamond of a clear pink hue, "is a curiosity, that we could readily identify anywhere. It weighs eight carats, less a sixteenth, and is worth $5,000. The color is a rare one, and it is exquisitely pure. Here is another extraordinary diamond." He showed a large pearl-shaped stone of a cinnamon color. "That is an East Indian gem, and is very old. Although it weighs seventeen carats it is not worth as much as the smaller pink brilliant, on account of its color. Its value is $4,000. Such marked stones as those I have shown you we could positively identify by their characteristics. But there would be no means of identifying such stones as these," he said, as he poured a handful of small diamonds on the table. They were nearly all off color, and of small size.

"How, then, do you avoid mistakes and protect yourself against fraudulent claims when you take diamonds to set?"

"In the first place, we will have nothing to do with paste, no matter what price might be offered us to set it. Nobody in the store is allowed to wear a paste gem, and if by mistake a paste brilliant is taken in at the repair counter it is immediately sent back to the owner. That rarely happens. Some time ago, when we refused to reset a stone on the ground that it was paste, the owner was greatly surprised to hear that it was not genuine. The lady investigated the matter, and found that a dishonest servant had removed the diamond and substituted a paste gem. She had never known the difference, although an expert does not hesitate a moment in pronouncing upon the genuineness of a stone.

"When a diamond is brought to us," Mr. Andrews went on, "it goes immediately into the hands of an expert who gives it microscopic scrutiny. It is weighed, any chip or flaw is noted, and all these facts are recorded together with a little diagram indicating the location of the defects. Then it goes into the workman's hands. This enables us to be certain that we are returning exactly the same diamond that we take in. No one diamond in a thousand is free from flaws, so that there are always identifying characteristics. People are frequently surprised to find their diamonds have defects, but it is often the case that the cutter will leave in a flaw that can be covered by the setting, as very frequently the cutting out of a defect would lose a half a carat or more of weight."

"Will diamonds chip off in wearing?"

"Very rarely. You may lay a diamond on an anvil and strike it with a hammer and it will not break. At the same time a diamond has a grain, and a blow that happens to strike it along the line of cleavage may clip it. Most of the defects in stones are natural. Perfect pearls are even rarer than perfect diamonds. I recollect that a dealer once brought to us a collection of pearls valued at $250,000, and there was only one absolutely perfect one in the lot. The rarity of perfect pearls makes us consider this one of our most extraordinary pieces of jewelry."

He showed a pearl necklace, the pearls ranging in size from peas to filberts. They were all perfectly round, and some were iridescent. "Those we call Orients," he said, "and they are extremely rare. The necklace is worth $35,000."

"DOES it, after all, pay to be honest?" a disappointed young man writes. No, my son, not if you're honest for pay, it doesn't. Not if you are honest merely because you think it will pay; not if you are honest only because you are afraid to be a rogue; indeed, my dear boy, it does not pay to be honest that way. If you can't be honest because you hate a lie and scorn a mean action, if you can't be honest from principle, be a rascal; that's what you are intended for, and you'll probably succeed at it. But you can't make anybody believe in honesty that is bought and sold like merchandise.—Burlington Hawkeye.

New York English Spoken Here.

Although I knew scarcely a word of the Spanish language on my arrival at the main gulf seaport of the republic, I had little difficulty in getting along, as there was generally some one near at hand who could act as interpreter. In many of the stores in the City of Mexico the familiar European sign of "English spoken here" is displayed. One establishment varied the announcement as follows:

NEW YORK ENGLISH

SPOKEN HERE.

But this did not strike the tender chords of the hearts of our party with half the sentimental remembrance of home that was evoked when we came upon the sign made to rhyme:

Yankee gin, walk in;
Bourbon, rye, mind your eye.
Will you take a sip of rum?
Just step in, it's lots of fun.

"Le's go in 'er, Colonel," ejaculated one of the members of our company. "I 'gin to feel sorta as 'f I was to hum already. Le's have some Yankee drinks."

But the Colonel wouldn't go, having given up drinking long since, and but one or two were found who cared to step inside to shake hands with the Yankee author of the beautiful stanza given above.

Presently the refreshment partakers came out of the saloon, or whatever the place is called here. There was a look of disgust visible on the countenance of each and every one of them, while several clenched fists bid defiance to the air. It was some time before any of the drinkers would speak. Finally he who had been so anxious to taste "hum spirits" ejaculated:

"Damme! I hain't got over it yet. Thar wa'n't no Yankee thar, nor no hum likers. A —— Mexican jist give us pulky-pulqui, a native liquor—and we haven't got the stuff out of our mouths yet."

We afterward ascertained that the poetical sign was the work of an American practical joker, who persuaded the Mexican saloonkeeper that he would make lots of money out of American customers by displaying it.—City of Mexico letter.

A Wedding in Lapland.

A wedding is announced at the church, whose bells are pealing. We invite ourselves. A score of us enter the building. It is like most Lutheran churches, plain; but there is an altar with "seven candlesticks" and candles; a large cross, perfectly white; a pulpit midway, and commodious pews and seats. The hour is 2 in the afternoon, not in the morning, though as to lighting the church, it is "all one." Some dozen or so of the natives, all females, with handkerchiefs upon their heads, are present. Our party is seated at the front. I remain at the door. My wedding garments are not up to the highest style, but, as the procession enters the front door, I fall in behind with the small fry of the family. The bride is a tall girl, with inflammatory hair and cool demeanor. The groom is a thick-set, stout man, whose hair is erect, and whose imperturbability is quite equal to that of the woman whom he holds, gently, by the hand. She is dressed plainly in black. A long white veil depends from her back hair, held by a diadem of ivy, a plant in great request and reputation here in Norway. The friends of the bride and bridegroom, including parents, pass up to the platform with them and take seats on either side. A priest comes out from the saytum and stands before the altar silently, with his back to us, while the precentor from a side platform raises a sweet song, with whose music there is not so much accord by the audience. Then the bride and bridegroom kneel, a prayer is said and the two are one and all are happy. The bride is arrayed at the door, and the scene is concluded.

Some Big Hailstones.

Hailstones vary greatly in size. In ordinary storms they weigh from forty-six to 120 grains. It may be interesting to notice some of the largest on record. Holinshed (who is, however, a persistent wonder-monger) says that hailstones as large as eggs fell in England in the year 1202, during the reign of John; and that in the twentieth year of that of good King Alexander III. of Scotland (1269) there arose "great winds, with storms of such immeasurable hailstones, that many towns were thrown down" by their violence, and fires spread throughout the kingdom, "burning up steeples with such force of fire that the bells were in divers places melted." Those of the Abbey of Aberbrothock (Arbroath) were thus destroyed. In 1339, while Edward III. was marching near Chartres in France, his army was so much injured by a storm of immense hailstones that he concluded peace. Count de Mezeray relates that when Louis XII. of France made war against the Pope and carried his army into Italy (1510) bluish hailstones descended during a thunder-storm, one of which weighed about one hundred pounds! On June 21, 1245, there fell in Lancashire "hailstones as big as men's fists, which had diverse prints in them, some like gun holes." On the 7th of June, 1573, in Northamptonshire, some were found which measured six inches in circumference; and on the 29th of April, 1697, a storm passed over Cheshire and Lancashire, during which hailstones weighing eight ounces and measuring nine inches in circumference fell. Hertfordshire, on the 4th of May in the same year, was visited by a showey of hail which killed several persons. The stones were fourteen inches in circumference. M. Parent relates that hailstones as big as a man's fist and weighing from nine and a half to twelve and three-quarters ounces, fell in Le Perche on May 15th, 1703. Passing over many recorded and perhaps doubtful instances such as the above, we learn that during a hail-storm at Constantinople on October 5th, 1831, there fell stones weighing more than one pound. Similar stones are said to have been picked up in May, 1721, at Palestrina, Italy. Blocks of ice fell at Cazorta, in Spain, on June 5th, 1829, which weighed four and a half pounds; and in the South of France, during the latter part of October, 1844, some fell which weighed eleven pounds. After a hail-storm on May 8th, 1802, in Hungary, a piece of ice was found which measured more than three feet both in length and in width, with a thickness of two and a quarter feet. To conclude this list, a hailstone is said to have fallen in the reign of Tippo Saib which was the size of an elephant. It is possible that many of these so-called gigantic hailstones were simply masses of ice composed of a collection of hailstones agglomerated together in some hollow space into which they had fallen, and where they may have remained for some time after the general fall of hailstones had melted and disappeared.—Chambers' Journal.

Dining With the Two-Headed Girl.

In response to an invitation from Mr. J. B. Smith, a Star reporter took breakfast with Millie Christine, the double-headed girl. This interesting young lady possesses two heads, four arms, four feet, sings duets, waltzes, polkas, and boasts of several other accomplishments. When the reporter arrived all was in readiness for the morning meal. Five persons comprised the party. "The weather is exceedingly oppressive," was the greeting of the right side of the double-headed girl, as she shook the right hand of the scribe with two of her four hands. The left side smiled serenely and fanned itself vigorously with a disengaged hand. There was a great deal said at table, but the guest was there for the purpose of taking breakfast with Millie Christine and omitted to make a note of the conversation. The Nightingale occupied one entire side of the table, and while one of her pair of eyes was intent upon gazing on the well-spread table, the other was looking out of the window with a dreamy expression. Two plates were well filled with edibles and the work of destruction was begun. One-half of the lady had an especial fondness for fried chicken and toast, while the other would partake of nothing but porterhouse steak and fried potatoes. In the line of liquids one-half drank iced milk to the other's coffee, and two napkins were demanded and freely used. Somehow or other there was time for talking toward the close of the meal, and the Nightingale spoke freely and intelligently upon a number of interesting topics. At times one head would make an assertion which its companion could not entertain, and then an interesting and animated discussion would follow. Happily these arguments were amicably adjusted, and breakfast was finished in time for the double-headed lady to go to Bunnell's Museum for the mid-day exhibition.—New York Star.

A SIMPLE trap for moles consists of a glass or stoneware jar sunk into the ground under the mole-runs. The moles, while running along, fall into the jar, and the vertical slippery sides of the jar prevent their getting out again. Field mice are also frequently caught in these traps, which leads to the suspicion that they are the authors of much of the mischief attributed to moles, whose burrows form convenient avenues for the intruders.

Trust Your Wife.

A man who has made a few hundred dollars clear of his business was afraid to invest it and equally afraid to tell his wife he had such a sum. So he hit upon the expedient of hiding the wallet which contained it in an unused parlor stove, and feeling sure that no one would molest it, went about his business with the feeling that it was safe.

But one day his wife made a fire in the stove to burn up an accumulation of rubbish, and, happening to mention the fact to her husband, was astonished to see him jump up and run round like one possessed.

"You have ruined me, ruined me!" he shrieked; "All the savings I had were hidden in that stove. Oh, what idiots women are!"

"I think you acted more like an idiot," answered his wife calmly, "first in not telling me you had the money, next in putting it in such a place. Had you trusted me that money would now be out on investment instead of being burned up."

The man wrung his hands and groaned and made life a burden to himself and family, until he finally quieted down and acknowledged that he had no one to blame but himself. Then his wife gave him a bankbook with the amount he had lost credited to him.

"It was just by the merest chance that I found the wallet," she said, "and then I felt hurt and indignant to think you could not have trusted me with even a knowledge of your savings. If I am not fit to receive your confidence, I am not fit to be your wife."

Peace was restored and it is safe to surmise that the husband never again failed to trust his wife.

Women, especially those who have had little contact with the world of business, are not unfrequently gifted with large instincts, which give them a quick insight into business matters. No man who has a proper appreciation of his wife will sell a cow or a horse off his farm without consulting her. No merchant will buy a stock of dry goods without exchanging ideas with the partner of his life; trust your wife, not feebly and with restrictions, but fully, in whole measure. It is said that men are what their mother's make them. Many a man who has gone down into the depths would have been saved from moral and temporal disaster if he had only trusted his wife; not in the day of adversity, but in the day of prosperity. "Sho! What do wimmin know about business?" says some Solon to his household. Not much experimentally, it may be, but as the most disastrous failures are always made by men, it may be possible a woman might at least have a position as look-out on the ship to signal "danger ahead." The men who have become famous in the world have always relied upon the judgment of their wives. A French writer says that when a man has toiled step by step up a long flight of stairs he will be sure to find a woman at the top. The man who distrusts his wife's intelligence is to be pitied. The man who ignores it as beneath his dignity is a fool.

Historic Grounds in Nevada.

Twenty years ago the great American Desert was the terror of the overland emigrant. It was impossible to go around it, for it extended from the Colorado to the Cascades. All the routes that led to the land of promise crossed it and it was soon covered with the bleaching bones of stock and dotted with human graves. It is about forty miles from the lower end of the Humboldt Sink to the Truckee River at Wadsworth, and the name "Forty-Mile Desert" given to the stretch has become known the world over. There is no water fit to drink on the whole distance. The road lies through a sandy sage-brush plain, extending several miles west of the lake, where it strikes an alkali desert, in the centre of which the railroad has a station that it appropriately calls "White" Plains. This is the lowest point east of the mountains. Eight miles further is Mirage Station, which might serve as a memorial to the unfortunates who have been betrayed from their proper course by the picture of running water, waving trees and fields that existed only in the deceptive air. Near the middle of the journey is a boiling hot springs at the foot of the mountain and large beds of salt lie near, from which B. F. Leete and the Bonanza mines put up and ship large quantities to market. The deposit has killed all vegetation for a long distance around, leaving the flat old lake-bed as bare as a floor. Between there and Wadsworth are some very odd formations. The body of the country seems to be a light yellow substance, probably diatomous, over which lie high ridges of brown hills. The level places are strewn with heavy rocks of all sizes, as black as coal. There is no timber anywhere in sight and even the sage-brush is of inferior size. On either side are the ever-monotonous brown mountains, carved and grooved by centuries of wear and frost into fringes of stony lace. The railroad has made frequent attempts to get water for its engines, but without success. They bored 1,300 feet at Hot Springs, but got only a brackish mixture of liquid alkali. They haul water in tank cars for their section men between Lovelock's and Wadsworth and the engines make the run with one tankful, a distance of sixty-one miles. They formerly carried an extra car behind the engine with two wooden tanks to draw from, but new engines have been built with tanks that hold 3,780 gallons. They frequently run seventy-five miles without stopping and Nick Cole made a hundred-mile run once. It is a very pleasant comparison for the rich '49er who rides in the palace car over the ground where he walked along with sore and tired feet, urging his oxen out of the thirsty desert, half a lifetime ago.—Reno (Nevada) Gazette.

The Chivalrous "Comanche Bill."

An incident is related of Bill which happened in Wichita. Bill rode into the town dressed in a complete suit of buckskin and with a gang of honest rangers at his back. As he went along he saw a "counter-jumper," as he was pleased to call him, roughly catch a little girl about 18 years old by the shoulder and solicit her attention. The girl withdrew her arm angrily, and just then the scene fell under Bill's personal inspection.

"She was a poor girl," says Bill, "and plainly clad in an old dress, but I wan't going to see her insulted by any durned counter-hopper under my mountain eyes. I jest jumped down from my hoss and I called for that fellow to stop. He didn't seem to want to, but I made him stop. I took up the little girl in my arms and sat her down on a box. I took off her shoes and said to the counter-jumper: 'Now, I want you to get down and lick the dust off the soles of that poor girl's feet whom you have insulted!' And I made him do it. He looked down in the muzzle of a 45-caliber Colt's for just about half a minute, and then he came to his milk like a little lamb. And I made him lick that girl's feet for a plump two hours, though a big crowd gathered around, but I had all my men with me and did not care whether they liked it or not."—Kansas City Times.

Brother Gardner and the Whipping-Post.

The following open letter was then read:

Brother Gardner:

Did you, seven or eight weeks since, advocate the establishment of the whipping-post for petty offenses? Please give me a direct answer, in order to decide a wager.

"I did," said the old man as he arose, "an' I do now, and I shall in de fuchur, onless de need of it passes away. In de las' place, we am all awar' dat not one petty offense in five am punished, bekase de law doan' tech it, or bekase it's too much expense and trouble to prosecute. Sartin pussons make a bizness of loafin'. How many of 'em kin you convict of vagrancy? Sartin pussons insult lone women on de street. How many of 'em have eber been jailed? Paper Making.

The most ancient form of paper known was made from the papyrus seed. The inner cuticle of the stalk was separated into thin layers by a sharp point, the slips laid side by side and covered by another layer placed at right angles, made to adhere by pressure and then dried. The sheets were afterward beaten smooth with a mallet and polished with a piece of shell or ivory. Parchment and vellum—dressed skins—began to be used in place of papyrus in the seventh century, and shortly after the art of making paper from vegetable fibre was introduced into Europe from China. It was made from cotton. The Spaniards appear to be the first to use rags for its manufacture, and the oldest specimen of linen paper having a date is a treaty between the kings of Aragon and Castile in 1177. The Germans attempted the use of straw in 1756. Paper has been made of many different substances—potato vines, grass, bark, oakum, silk, tobacco, thistles, willow, cork, corn-stalks, basswood and bantam being only a small part of the list. The first paper-mill in America was established in 1690, near Philadelphia.

A SHEFFIELD (England) firm are making steel-faced plates, by a process not yet divulged, which are apparently destined to work a revolution in the matter of armor for ships of war. The iron plates hitherto used have had to be of enormous thickness to withstand the impact from the heavy shots used, and the ships have, therefore, been of unwieldly size to bear the weight, while the armor, even if it stopped the projectile, has invariably been cracked and split in all directions. Experiments recently made on behalf of the English Government, and by the French as well, show that the new steel plates not only shatter the projectile itself, but show no wounds beyond the dents caused by the collision. The French ships of war now being built will, therefore, be protected by the new armor.

RESCUED FROM DEATH.

William J. Coughlin, of Somerville, Mass., says: In the fall of 1876 I was taken with bleeding of the lungs, followed by a severe cough. I lost my appetite and flesh, and was confined to my bed. In 1877 I was admitted to the hospital. The doctors said I had a hole in my lung as big as a half dollar. At one time a report went around that I was dead. I gave up hope, but a friend told me of DR. WILLIAM HALL'S BALSAM FOR THE LUNGS. I got a bottle, when, to my surprise, I commenced to feel better, and to-day I feel better than for three years past. I write this hoping every one afflicted with diseased lungs will take DR. WILLIAM HALL'S BALSAM, and be convinced that CONSUMPTION CAN BE CURED. I can positively say it has done more good than all the other medicines I have taken since my sickness.

Endorsed and recommended by the medical profession, for Dyspepsia, General Debility, Female Diseases, Want of Vitality, Nervous Prostration, and Convalescence from Fevers, &c.

GENTLEMEN:—I was suffering from general debility to such an extent that my labor was exceedingly burdensome to me. A vacation of a month did not give me much relief, but on the contrary, was followed by increased prostration and sinking chills. At this time I began the use of your IRON TONIC, from which I realized almost immediate and wonderful results. The old energy returned and I found that my natural force was not permanently abated. I have used three bottles of the Tonic. Since using it I have done twice the labor that I ever did in the same time during my illness, and with double the ease. With the tranquil nerve and vigor of body, has come also a clearness of thought never before enjoyed. If the Tonic has not done the work, I know not what. I give it the credit.

TUESDAY morning at a little before six o'clock, the president was carried on a bed to a covered wagon, and driven slowly down Pensylvania avenue, which was covered with sawdust, and so taken to the train for removal to Long Branch. The railroad track had been extended to the avenue, and after he was on board, the train went slowly away at first, but at times went 40 to 50 miles an hour. It started at 6:30, and arrived at Baltimore at 8:30 a. m., and at Elberon, the station for Long Branch at 1:10 p. m. He rode in a sort of spring bed, and seemed but little fatigued by the journey, although the unusual excitement caused a rise in his pulse. But he is still quite weak, and his recovery will be a very slow one.

THE MARQUIS DE ROCHAMBEAU and his wife will be present at the coming centennial celebration at Yorktown. The French government will also send a number of officers, civil and military. Their naval squadron from the West Indies will also be present and take part in the celebration.

TRAIN ROBBERS threw the train of U. P. road off the track near Colfax last week. They were in a fair way to succeed in plundering the express car and passengers, when, from some unknown cause, they became alarmed and ran off, leaving part of their tools behind. No one was injured.

THAT there is no certainty in old sayings, may be shown from the following remarkable occurrence which we copy from a late paper: "People who have flattered themselves that lightning never strikes twice in the same place may see the ruins of a barn near Council Bluffs which has been burned by lightning six times in ten years. It was rebuilt five times and the owner then concluded that Providence wanted the site for some special purpose."

A. M. JONES, the gentlemanly proprietor and captain of the steamer, Roxy, on Syracuse lake, astonished us by dropping quietly into our sanctum on Monday. He was here to purchase lumber and shingles for the new buildings he is going to erect near Cedar Beach. He has purchased a piece of wooded ground there, and will put up cottages and other conveniences for those who attend that watering place. He will have a sufficient amount of ground set apart for excursionists and others, so that parties going there may find everything for their convenience. He will take his family to his new property as soon as he can get his house ready. The Roxy, he says, runs better now than ever, as the new propeller he has just put in, works nicely.

WILLIAMS COUNTY, OHIO, is at present enjoying a season of kukluxism or something of the sort. It seems that several years ago, a man was convicted of some offense in the north part of the county, and sent to the penitentiary for ten years. He gave out threats of vengeance should he ever get out. Now he is back again, having served out his term, and seems bent upon carrying his threats into execution. It is supposed that he is the one who has been defacing the monuments in the cemeteries there, digging into graves, writing obscene and threatening letters on tombstones and fences, and tearing up things in general. It is also believed that the burning of the Catholic church was his work. Last week an attempt was made to arrest him, when a fight ensued between him and the officer resulting in the officer's receiving a severe and dangerous wound from a revolver in the ex-convict's hands. Sheriff Kober, of that county, has offered a reward of $250 for his arrest dead or alive. The hoodlum claims to be in league with the devil, and it does look as if he had "aid and comfort" from some such source.

WHILE reading a recent letter to the Bluffton Banner, from one of the citizens of that place, now in England, we were struck by the following in regard to public schools: "A comparison of the schools of this country with those of the United States results in favar of the latter. As to school furniture and convenience they are where Wells county was twenty-five years ago. The primary rooms are universally seated with little benches without backs. The more advanced grades are provided with writing desks about twelve feet long, and the pupils sit behind them on benches without backs. Each room is furnished with a blackboard about three feet square for the master's use only. Much of the teaching is done by pupil teachers. A room of forty or fifty pupils will be divided into three or more sections over which older pupils will preside and conduct recitations at the same time. Attendance is compulsory. Each family, if able, must pay from six to twelve cents per week, according to the number of pupils sent. After the age of fourteen the pupil's attendance is optional. These features are found in all the national schools of Great Britain.

ALL Northern Indiana is ablaze with excitement over the approaching grand exhibition offered by the managers of the Northern Indiana Fair Association. We feel safe in saying that never before has the liberality of the following splendid programme been surpassed: Beginning at Fort Wayne, Ind., Sept. 26, and for the succeeding five days, the attractions promised increase in rapid interest, and embrace daily balloon ascensions, Roman Hippodrome, four-in-hand chariot races, Wild Indians, fresh from the Ogallalahs of the Sioux, in their wonderful pony races, chase for a bride, battle acts, and many other marvellous feats, graceful bicycle races, free to all the world; grand inter-state fireman's hose reel contest, introducing the champions of various states; square trotting races, running races, magnificent exhibition at night, of Fort Wayne's superb system of waterworks, illuminated by electric and calcium colored lights, presenting fountains of water 150 feet high, iridescent in the grandeur of living fire and water; closing this gala feat of pleasure and instruction with a stupendous and never to be forgotten display of fire works. All railroads entering Fort Wayne will furnish excursion rates. Don't fail to attend at least one day, you will never regret it.

Man Killed at Cedar Beach.

A man named Jeff. Paneton, who has been employed at times about the club house at Cedar Beach, went to Syracuse last saturday evening to attend to some business. He intended to pay off a small mortgage on his property, and settle an account with his doctor. The latter he attended to, but it is not known whether he paid the mortgage or not. It is believed he had a small sum of money with him when he started for home. This was about 11 o'clock at night, and he was accompanied by the two colored waiters who worked at the club house. When they got opposite the club house, these two men left Paneton to go on alone to his house which was a little farther down the track. Sunday morning his mangled body was found on the track, not more than a hundred yards beyond where the two negroes left him. His brains had been crushed out, two of his fingers were cut off, and he was otherwise injured. One theory is, that a passing train ran over him. But there are others, who fear that he met with foul play. He leaves a small family.

CAPTAIN HOWGATE, late of the signal service bureau, and at one time commander of an expedition in search of the North Pole, has been found to be a defaulter to the government to the extent of $150,000 or more. Carelessness among the treasury officials enabled him to get this amount by means of drafts on the government for expenses in his department, over and above what was needed.

A MAN who attempted to cross Caddo lake in Texas the other day, was attacked by a crowd of alligators. They were probably after a quarter of beef that he had in his boat, but distrusting their intentions, he kept them from upsetting the boat, until he reached a tree standing in the lake. Into this he climbed, abandoning the boat and its contents. He was rescued the next day.

ACCORDING to the Indiana bureau of statistics, the number of acres of wheat grown in this county in 1880, was 28,240; and in 1881, 34,765. Corn in 1880, 20,467 acres; and in 1881, 21,269. In the entire state, we have of wheat in 1880, 2,517,719 acres; and in 1881, 3,191,834; of corn, we had 3,421,509 acres in 1880, and 3,145,111 in 1881.

THEY have a lioness roaming the woods in Spencer county. The animal has been seen by the usual number of reliable hunters and fishermen. The only link in the chain of evidence now lacking, is the testimony of the veracious party that saw the big snake-and-turtle unpleasantness in Steuben county the other day.

THERE seems to be difficulty in the matter of storage of grain in Baltimore, and rates at that place have advanced. At New York, however, it is understood that the storage is still ample. The grain in store there is at present about 10,000,000 bushels, while the elevators have a capacity of 23,000,000.

WHILE planting torpedoes in making experiments for harbor defense, at Portsmouth, N. H., last week, Lieut. Edes and Lieut. Spaulding, naval officers, were killed by a premature explosion. It is a sad event, as they were young men of great promise.

THE B. & O. road opened their new grain elevator at Baltimore on Monday of this week. This will help greatly to relieve the present troubles there in regard to storage, as the capacity of the elevator is 1,800,000 bushels.

THE Tri-State Fair at Toledo will be held Sept. 12 to 17. There will be the usual reduction of fare on railroads, and extraordinary inducements in the way of sight, seeing, races etc. The fair lasts the entire week.

GRAND HAVEN, MICH., had a terrible explosion of gas, at the Cutler House last Thursday afternoon. Charles Cutler, brother of the proprietor, and some others were badly injured. It is feared the former will die.

MANY believe that Captain Howgate has gone to Canada, and will forfeit his bail. He has gone some where, that is certain. Possibly he is taking a second look for the North Pole

AN oil tank with a capacity of 2,000 barrels of oil exploded last week at Cleveland. It had been emptied, but the gas left in the tank exploded in some manner not known.

Harry Fisher has gone to Toledo to clerk in a drug store. We can assure our Toledo friends that Harry has the muscle to do up any dose of quinine that may be needed, even in that sickly burg.

John Fisher is the veteran member of the band, and one of the best performers on that silver horn, (that's all the name we can think of) there is in the country. And we are glad to see that the boys are paying attention to their practice once more.

Reuben Loutzenheiser has a curiosity in the way of an apple tree. He has twisted and trained the limbs in all sorts of fantastic shapes and they continue to grow as if nothing had happened to them. It will be a great curiosity when it is a large tree.

A pleasant little party went to Angola last Thursday. Frank Long, John Fisher and Misses Eva and Clara Lacey went there with a team, and returned to Pleasant Lake after the game of ball closed. At the Lake they were re-enforced by Richard Shull and wife, E. P. Dickinson and Lydia North, Ed. Mitchell and Jennie Francis, Dell Locke and Dora Trout, Charlie Clark and Rallie Crane, Craig Day and Aggie Sinclair, Will Patterson and Tillie Williamson and others whose names have escaped our memory. Here the programme was fully carried out by a picnic in honor of Miss Eva Lacey, who was soon to return to her studies at Mt. Holyoke. The party are of the opinion that it was one of the most enjoyable gatherings of the season.

Peter Smith, living near town, has disappeared from view. Peter had loved well, but not very wisely for a long time. It was another man's wife. It was also rumored, that Peter's father has exhibited a similar weakness for the same piece of femininity. And to make matters still more complicated, the husband of the woman in question came upon the scene, re-enforced by the officers of the law. Peter liked opposition, but when it began to come from four different points of the compass, in the shape of an angry father, an irate husband, a deputy sheriff, the adverse opinions of his neighbors, human nature could endure it no longer. So he took the frail young creature of sixty to his manly twenty-three-year-old bosom, and incontinently skipped.

Corunna.

Lots of wheat brought here.

Ed. Orr sold his big two-year-old colt.

Several new buildings are going up in the east end of town.

Dr. Mercer is occupying his new store. He has room enough for two pill manufactories.

There were no services at the churches Sunday, owing to the illness of the ministers. Spring chickens, you know.

Joe Williamson, dealer in "damfino," wears a police badge. He handcuffs every haw-eater who expands his lungs, or disturbs the citizens who pay taxes at this mile-post.

Miss Lila Broach has three wild canary birds which she raised in a cage. The celebrated bird trainer, with the two-headed boy show, wanted to enter into a contract with her (for the birds, of course), but she emphatically refused to have anything to do with him.

We called on Joe Loveland, "whew bet." Joe was in his sanctum sitting in a high-chair fast asleep. A beautiful sight to gaze upon, and how we wished that nature had ordained us for an artist. In his right hand he held a last year's almanac, and in the other a pair of inlaid brass spectacles. We said, "Hi! Joe," and Joe said, "I'll take mine straight." We opened the door gently and made our exit.

Some very poor management was displayed by the supervisor, Peter Moody, and the men employed to build a bridge near Calkin's brick-yard. A half hour's work filling in both sides whould have let teams back and forth Sunday. People coming or going to Corunna were compelled to go through fields, let down bars and fences, or give Mr. Daily a contemptuous smile and pat him on the back followed by the remark, "You've got a heart bigger than an elephant's paw."—he was toll-gate man. Lafe Miller and his celebrated trotting colt halted at this bridge. They crossed in balloon style. The force at the brick-yard elevated the buggy and carried it across, and Lafe elevated himself and carried the horse across. They reached Corunna just as it stopped raining, and the last we saw of Lafe he was looking for the contractors of that bridge with a white oak rail sticking out of his hip pocket.

MARRIAGES.

As foreshadowed in these columns last week F. E. Davenport and Miss Frankie Ford were married. The happy event took place Friday forenoon. Frank and his fair young bride took the noon train for Detroit, and returned Monday. They had a pleasant trip, made doubly so by a knowledge that the printer had his share of the wedding cake. For this favor we return our thanks to Mr. D. and his wife, as well as to the bevy of fair ladies who brought it to our sanctum.

At the residence of the bride's parents, Sept. 4, 1881, by Rev. W. L. Meese, Geo. W. Buertzner to Rachel A. Lyon.

C. A. Jenkins and lady count one more for the census of 1890. Another Democrat vote.

The price of fresh fish is considerable lower since the return of J. D. Leighty and Al. Bishop from Cedar Beech. Jake says the fishing is splendid.

John Boots, of Jackson, was in town Saturday. It does us good to hear him tell of his experience with the lost baby at Mansfield, O. Ask him for its history.

Some rascal tried to break into the residence of Jake Sechler on Thurday evening. A good dose of No. 5 shot would have been the right kind of medicine to administer in that kind of a case.

The boys who broke open the B. & O. car Sunday last, and stole therefrom a lot of watermelons had better keep shady. They are all known and the grand jury will probably hear of their actions.

We hear it whispered that a married man, living in this place is having a good time generally with a lady and grass widow. Both parties are well known and have stood on the top shelf in society. A bombshell is likely to fall, and its descent may strike where it will hurt. Those who play with fire brands are sure to get scorched.

Your correspondent from Spencerville, got considerably frightened, in regard to two certain young men from Spencerville, who tried to run the picnic in their own interest. The boys acted monstrously mean and your correspondent knew it, and as he put it, ought to have been swallowed, and would have been had they not fixed the matter up. As to the swallowing part we think it would be but a small affair to swallow what is left, especially if you would leave out millinery and correspondent establishments. GUSTO.

COMESKY'S CORNERS.

Mr. Zimmerman, of Goshen, formerly of Spencerville, was visiting with his brother-in-law, Charles Comesky.

No pains or expense will be spared to make this entertainment the finest ever given in Auburn. The costumes are elegant and the scenery very beautiful. —The girls in this place take considerable stock in the devil. There is hardly a day passes that some three or four are not in the office trying to induce him to accept the position of chairman for a literary society or carry cake on a waiter at a religious social.

—The Auburn correspondent of the Steuben Republican says, "two little boys do all the work sprinkling the streets here." Well, yes, they do, except which is done by a ten-horse power engine and span of 1400-lb horses. The sprinkler, when filled with water, weighs over three tons and, of course, two little boys could trot right off with it.

—Chas. Hoft and Miss Lizzie Bittner were married last Friday at the residence of the bride's mother. The COURIER wishes Charley and his better-half a happy future, and that they may live long and prosper. Their friends gave them a belling and were treated to a keg of the best beer in the market. Charley is a liberal fellow, and has many friends here.

—It looked like rain Saturday, a few flashes of lightning dimmed the eye occasionally, and all the popular influence of the town could not get John Bunch to perform his part in the buffalo parade. They offered to have one of the best metalic, double finish, lightning rods placed upon his back with nickel-plated screws, but John positively refused. He didn't propose to take any chances while "old Forks" was on his ear.

—We hear that the railroad men are complaining of the frequency with which boys jump on and off of freight trains while passing throught the town. It was only last week we published the accident of Asha Brandon who received serious injuries by leaping from a train while in motion, but even this accident has not put parents on their guard, and they allow their children to idle away their time and risk their lives by loafing about depots. Ain't it time that this subject was given some attention.

—We visited the paint rooms of J. W Shaffer & Co's. wagon and carriage manufactury and saw on some handsome original designs made by the brush in the hands of the junior partner, Ora Shaffer. Ora is a natural born genius. He learned his trade without serving a day's apprenticeship and ranks among the best workmen in the county. When he paints a buggy or a wagon you can depend on its standing the storm. He is very particular about his work and uses the best paints in the market.

—A prominent man connected with the Wabash road remarked: "Auburn stands a better show to-day than any town along the line to secure the shops." Our citizens are not making any effort whatever. We should think the fact that this place or the junction is altogether the most desirable location that the manages of this line would locate the shops here, whether the old fogies encouraged them or not. There are several men at Auburn Junction who can donate $5000, and then get it back double.

—"Old Mother Mains," a terrible bad character living at Kendallville, died last week. She has ruined many a virtuous girl and led astray a large number of young men. Auburn has several examples of her training, and we think every town within the northeastern Indiana district can say the same as we do. It is a blessing to Kendallville and the towns surrounding, that this wicked woman has "passed in her checks." We might write a long article upon this subject, but as she is now where she cannot do any more harm we will let by-gones be by-gones.

—When the first bell rings in the morning the good little boy hies away toward the school house, and as soon as he is out of sight skins off toward the creek for a quiet swim. And when he should be mastering fractions and the history of his country, he is monkeying about the ball ground playing rounders or sampling Mr. Brown's choicest pears. At noon he turns up at the dinner table as hungry as a bear and hurries back to school. In the afternoon he varies the programme by going down back of the grave yard and having a game of seven up, or learning the mysteries of chewing plug tobacco.

FOR SALE.—A good sausage chopper worth $50 for $20.

S. U. TARNEY.

—That must have been a nice game of ball if our boys don't exaggerate too much. The Newville boys got up early that morning, ate a big mess of haws for breakfast, and with blood in their eyes and victory on their horns they remained upon the diamond field until the Auburn Astonishers arrived. Dr. Bowman was umpire, and we hear that Doc. knew about as much regarding the rule of the national game, as a blind mule does about seven-up. They were quarreling and sending "back talk" to one another from the time they began until they quit. There was one "deaffy" in the Newville club who took the place of side show on this occasion. He would stand with a club over his shoulder until seven balls had been pitched, when he would light out for the first base like a quarter-horse coming down the home stretch. Warren Miller had him posted. We are sorry that Quince Fusselman was unable to be on the grounds—he's a splendid fellow for reference when the umpire leaves his book at home. The boys will play the third contest at Butler, and we hope they will have a rattlin' time and a good bawl game.

—When a fellow goes to see his girl, waiting half an hour in the parlor for her to come down, is about as disagreeable a thing as can happen to him. And when the old lady is sitting in one corner of the room, scowling at you with her lips shut as tight as an ice-box, and the old man perched on a high chair in another corner, trying in vain to grind out a few ideas regarding the weather, it is positively a bad strike But when you are a catch, and have been expected for an hour, and the anxious mother receives you with open arms, and the father brings up the rear and says "howdy," with a broad hand extended, there is no foul plays to brighten the prospects of marching on; then life seems different, and everything glides along as if was greased. Always aim to be a good catch.

—A brief trip to Garrett, last week, gave us the opportunity to look in on two or three of our friends in that thriving place. We found C. Beyher, the merchant, up to his ears in business, with a room chuck full of goods and a new stock expected in a few days. He says his business is excellent. J. Wm. Wagoner, with a hotel, restaurant, saloon and drug store on his hands, is full of business, of course. But he has the ability to be obliging and affable to his customers in all these branches of business. We hope to make a longer call on our neighboring town at an early day and give it a more complete inspection.

—We are glad to say to the readers of the COURIER that Mr. Hugh Culbertson has located among us and purchased a half interest in the popular Excelsior hardware store, the firm now being Snyder & Culbertson. Mr. C. is a thorough business man and will keep things humming at the Excelsior. The stock will be increased and our readers can be accommodated in any article they wish generally kept in a well regulated hardware store. They will also deal in all kinds of agricultural and farm machinery and self at reasonable rates. North of court-house.

—We are sorry to record the death of one of Mr. and Mrs. Pendfield's little children. It has been ailing more or less ever since it was born, but no immediate danger of death was anticipated until within the last few days. Mr. Penfield was away from home. He left last week in company with Rev. H. Johnson for a visit to New York and several other prominent cities of the east. A telegram, however, brought him home in time to see the little one put into its last resting place.

—The match game of ball played at Newville last Monday, between the Auburn and Newville nines, resulted in a tie game, each nine making a score of 38. The Auburn nine proposed to play the tenth inning, but the Newville nine declined to play longer. There was some very healthy growling done at the umpire, and at times the moral law was badly fractured.

—Probably this item will meet the eye of a number who have noticed a pipe at the stave factory about one hundred feet long and near eighteen inches in circumference, and wondered what it was for. A small fire is started at the mouth of this pipe, and the saw-dust is carried from the mill and feeds the fire, thus consuming this article and not allowing it to accumulate on the yard.

—George Staley will not take his girl to the cantata. Can't afford it this time. He was playing, "I sigh for a glance of your eye, love," and in his earnestness, caved in the heads of a bass drum. The new sheep skin will arrive the day before the performance, by the U. S. express, C. O. D.

—A kid glove organ and piano agent remarked to a crowd that "Auburn had the homeliest girls on his route." This great judge of female beauty will weigh about ninety pounds, with a winter outfit on, and is engaged to a dish rattler employed in a hotel at Kendallville. We'll give a dollar for the correct cognomen of this smarty.

—The grade force on the Wabash was put back in their work by the rain last week, and will not get through until sometime this week. The banks along each side caved in and washed the waste dirt into the ditch, thereby making considerable more labor than anticipated.

—A Little battle was had on North Main street last Saturday, wherein Obe. Cool struck an old man of over sixty years of age. When the gray haired man made for Obe, he ran, and when he reached his father's residence climbed the fence—'fraid he couldn't get through the gate soon enough.

—We see by our exchanges that two types named Free and Hostetter had a foot race at Ligonier, and Bill wasn't Free enough to beat the fellow. It is very mildly hinted that Free sold the race. We are acquainted enough with Bill to know that he is a slippery son of the stick.

A Bold Theft.

TWO MEN GO THROUGH SAM POMMERT'S DRAWER.

While Sam Pommert was gone to his supper, and Geo. Grund was eating his evening meal in a rear room, two men named Fair and Monroe, living south of town, entered. After they left, it was discovered that $7.75 was missing from the money drawer and the fact that no one had been in the room since the money was placed there but the two men above mentioned, left very satisfactory evidence that they were the guilty parties. An investigation went far enough to cause an arrest and they were given a hearing before the 'Squire. Fair was released but Monroe, upon whose person the money was found, was remanded to jail and was given a second hearing Tuesday. He was released on $500 bail, $600 for the money taken, and $300 for the barber's tools. Both of these young men have bad records in the past, and especially Monroe. It is said that he stole wheat of a widow woman some time ago, and last winter they were both arrested for disturbing a religious meeting, wherein W. H. Dills persuaded them to plead guilty and they were allowed to go with a light fine for their cussedness. If the reports current are half true regarding the devilment of this Monroe he should be hauled over the bar of justice in no pleasant manner.

Buffalo Sale.

KNOCKED OFF FOR THE SUM OF [illegible].

The sale of the buffalo last Saturday afternoon was much amusement for a large crowd of spectators. The first bid started at twenty-one dollars, was raised from twenty-five to fifty cents each time until it reached the above amount. James McClellan, living over the Rhine, was the lucky man. He will turn the buffalo loose in his berry patch south of town, and we hereby give a timely warning to all the boys. If Jake McGlanis had been the auctioneer it would have sold for double the amount—Frank Leas ain't the right cut for a sale crier.

—Louis Johnson, the gentlemanly agent of the Wabash, informs us that since taking in the Detroit extension to the Wabash system the local ticket sales at this place were over $500 more for the month of August than the previous month. It seems that the mutilator of silver and gold coin has about ended his race. Principal business houses now refuse to accept clipped or mutilated coin except at a discount. In times past the clipping or drilling of gold and silver money afforded the operator a big profit.

—The law of compensation manifests self in even the humblest spheres of life. For instance, take the young farmer and his wife. Last spring she cradled while he sowed; this fall he cradles and she sews. This is certainly a great country.

PRESIDENT GARFIELD.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 27.

Twenty-four hours have elapsed since hope of the President's recovery was abandoned, and he still lives. He may continue to live for three or four days, the doctors say, but the mournful conclusion remains that each day draws him one day nearer to the grave. The capital is in mourning. The outward signs of grief have not been yet put on, but all hearts are as deeply stirred as though the end had come. The nation is watching at the bedside of a dying President, and the vigil is nearly finished.

To describe the painful anxiety with which every word uttered by the physicians to-day, every look and gesture by the men who are fighting with death, has been received, would be impossible. The most encouraging words which they could utter conveyed so little hope that the worst would almost have been preferable. When the President was shot, and the physicians could not tell whether he would live out the night of the 2d of July, all hearts were gladdened by the news that he had one chance to live. Twice since then has he been down almost into the depths of death, and stout hearts trembled, but did not fail. Even now he has a chance for life—the chance that a glimmering spark of vitality always holds out—but too feeble and uncertain for human hearts to grasp. The thought of the grief which prevailed in the sick-room was sufficient to bring tears to many eyes. A strong, true and patriotic man, faded and wasted almost beyond recognition, lying upon his couch, at times his mind wandering and his nervous fingers nodding in accord with some unfathomable symphony of an unsteady brain, the face disfigured by an ungainly swelling, from which the accumulated poison slowly dropped; departed strength visible in shrunken features and motionless limbs; his stricken wife seated by the bedside performing, with loving hands, every comforting ministration. She who has been the great supporter of her husband in his trouble, feeds him as she would feed a child, and gives no evidence of the agony which is tugging at her heart. The physicians are constantly by the sick man's side watching anxiously for some new danger to be met, or eagerly looking for the first manifestation of a favorable change.

In this manner the hours fly by and night falls without a sign of hope or a ray of comfort.

While it cannot be said that there was much improvement in the patient's condition yesterday, it is at the same time true that he did not lose ground, and that he held his own better than was anticipated by the physicians. He took more than the usual quantity of liquid food, and assimilated it, and no symptoms of gastric disturbance followed. His mind was clearer than on the day before, due, doubtless, to the fact that the suppuration through the ear of the parotid gland removed the pressure from the brain. The patient rested more easily and slept more than on the previous day, and the color of his skin and his general appearance was more healthy. The pulse and temperature were somewhat higher than on the previous day, however, and the character of the pus flowing from the wound was not as healthy as it had been. There was less of it, and it appeared to have a watery appearance. Dr. Boynton thinks that this is owing to the President's enfeebled condition and the thinness of his blood. Mrs. Garfield has not yet lost hope. She firmly believes that her husband is going to recover.

There was a very touching episode in the sick-room last night. The patient recognized his wife sitting by his bedside, and, addressing her in a weak and trembling voice, said: "Crete, you had better go to your room and get a little rest." Mrs. Garfield begged to be permitted to stay a little longer, whereupon the President remarked that he feared the time was at hand when they should separate forever. Mrs. Garfield was severely shaken by this last remark, but, like the brave, good woman that she is, she mastered her feelings and appeared composed.

Col. Corkhill, District Attorney at Washington, has been summoned home from Cape May. He says a secret organization has plotted to take Guiteau from jail and inflict upon him torture which will be a warning to assassins. Even the jail guards await an excuse to shoot the fiend, who has had scarcely any sleep since the first relapse of the President.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 28.

Despair has again given place to hope. Yesterday at noon few persons in Washington expected that President Garfield would live forty-eight hours. Some even of those about him had privately begun to make arrangements as to what they should do after the fatal result should come, but to-day no words have come from the sick-room but those of good cheer. The President is still improving. The danger seems to be growing less. There have been three continuous favorable bulletins. Gen. Swaim and Col. Rockwell have telegraphed to their friends that the President has not been so well for a week. Secretary Blaine has sent a cheering message to Europe, and the physicians all speak words of hope. "We are exceedingly hopeful," said Dr. Agnew, as he and Dr. Hamilton were leaving the White House grounds after the evening dressing. "We are exceedingly hopeful. There must be a turn in all cases, and it may be this is the crisis, and that a favorable turn has come." Dr. Hamilton expressed similar views. Dr. Agnew earlier in the day had said: "The President now has more than an even chance."

WASHINGTON, Aug. 29.

The President's condition this morning is decidedly encouraging, and the feeling among physicians, nurses and friends is that if this improvement can be maintained for forty-eight hours there will be reasonable ground for confidence in ultimate recovery. The one drawback to this hopeful outlook consists in the fact that fears are entertained of the formation of abscesses upon the lungs—a complication that has been dreaded ever since the existence of blood-poisoning became fully established. One of the surgeons is reported as having said that in sounding the President's chest a somewhat dull response was produced by the percussion, and that there was reason to fear that this was indicative of abscess formation on the lungs—a state of things certain to prove fatal unless speedily checked.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 30.

The favorable symptoms in the President's condition which manifested themselves on Sunday continued all day yesterday and up to this morning. His pulse and temperature showed decided improvement, the glandular swelling reduced considerably, and the wound presented a healthy appearance. The patient took more than the usual amount of nourishment, which he appeared to assimilate without difficulty. The stomach is in good condition, and all the indications point to continued improvement. The physicians, who had nearly lost hope, are once more almost confident. A slight incision in the gland was attended with favorable results. The bullet-wound continues to heal, and the swollen gland has diminished. The administration of stimulants to the patient has been discontinued. Heretofore there has been administered in each enemata four drams of whisky mixed with the yolks of eggs. The physicians felt at the time liquor was first given in large doses that it was absolutely necessary that his system should be quickly stimulated. The President's mental faculties are clear, and, acting with his improved condition, aid the work of recovery. While recognizing that the President is still in a dangerous condition, Dr. Bliss said he felt no hesitation in saying he thought the chances now are in favor of his recovery. Dr. Bliss says that the ball is moving deeper into the cavity of the pelvis, probably in the direction of the rectum. This downward movement he regards as a rather favorable circumstance. The ball, he says, will have to be taken out sometime, and can be taken from that part of the body toward which it is going as easily at least as it could be taken from its original location.

Dr. Agnew does not believe that the President has lost as much weight as Secretary Blaine's telegram to Minister Lowell represented last week. Dr. Bliss agrees with Dr. Agnew, and adds that the patient has not reached the dangerous limit of emaciation. A man, he adds, can lose two-fifths of his weight without endangering his life.

As hope returns, more is learned in detail of the terrible anxiety of last Friday. It appears that the surgeons, after the alarming symptoms of the morning, decided that it was useless to longer continue the struggle, and two of their number were selected to wait on Mrs. Garfield and inform her that medical science could do no more, and that she must prepare for the worst. The interview which occurred between these surgeons and Mrs. Garfield will, if reports are true, be regarded as one of the most dramatic incidents in this extraordinary case. Capt. Henry Marshal, of this District, a friend of the President and his family, says that Mrs. Garfield heard the news with great composure, and that, smothering her emotion, she arose and said: "Gentlemen, you shall not give him up. He is not going to die. He is going to live. I feel, I know it. Go back to your post, every one of you, and leave it not until every remedy is exhausted—until death itself has set its seal upon him—for I will not believe he is dying. Go back and do what you can. You cannot do more, but do not give up. I am his wife, and I say that we will not give up until the end itself is upon us." Mrs. Garfield has never surrendered more than a moment or two at a time to her grief, and then she has retired to her room, and after a brief absence has returned to her post of duty at the President's bedside.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 31.

The President is no better and he is no worse. He remains upon the dead level, where one of his physicians said last night that they hoped he would not remain many days. They, of course, hope and are confident that, when a change does come, it will be for the better, but this confidence is not as strong as might be desired. The situation is still one of uncertainty, and there are a few pessimists who fear that the prospects are not as good for his recovery as they seem to be. Another incision was made in the parotid gland, which resulted satisfactorily and perceptibly decreased the swelling. The wound remains unchanged. There was a slight rise in the pulse, due to this incision. The patient took his nourishment, consisting of koumiss, milk porridge, and beef tea, quite freely and with apparent relish. He ate a small piece of milk-toast. His stomach continues healthy, and the physicians seem to be rather confident that there will be no more trouble from that source. The condition of the wound is healthy. The fact that the ball has changed its position and is moving lower down is considered a favorable feature of the case by the surgeons, and by some is supposed to account for the rally made a few days ago. That the President is feeling better and his mental faculties are clear are considered signs of improvement.

The police yesterday arrested another "crank" at the White House gate. It was a poor colored man, manifestly insane. He was bent upon the sanguinary mission of killing every man who was not a Garfield man, and had a long tin can into which he proposed to place their heads. He was arrested without resistance. Dealers in nostrums which they claim will be of benefit to the President are very numerous here, and Secretary Blaine is visited by so many of them that it has become necessary to station a policeman in citizen's clothes near his house to relieve him from the annoyance to which he is subject at all times of the day and night. Some of these persons are so persistent that it is necessary to remove them by the police.

The assassin, Guiteau, has written another letter to District Attorney Corkhill, in which he claims protection from the mob. At the conclusion of his letter he plainly shows that he is well acquainted with the President's condition, for he says: "While the President is in this precarious condition, I have confidence in no one. I look to you. See that I am securely protected." The wretch has also indicated a desire to marry some wealthy Christian lady of good family.

About 100 letters a day are received at the White House, addressed either to Mr. or Mrs. Garfield. During the early stages of the President's illness the letters were mostly to him. Now they are generally addressed to Mrs. Garfield, and express the writers' sympathy with her. Most of them bear the evidence of being written by persons of inferior attainments, but at the same time they testify to the genuine sentiment of the people in their distress.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 1.

The President's condition during the past twenty-four hours has been highly favorable. He rested quietly, slept well, and for longer periods of time than for several days. His temperature and pulse showed decided signs of improvement, the pulse falling as low as 95—lower than at any time since the 8th of August. He took rather more than the usual quantity of liquid nourishment, and swallowed the juice of a piece of beefsteak which he chewed. His wound looks healthy, and the condition of the parotid gland is as good as could be expected. The physicians feel greatly encouraged at the decided improvement in the patient's general condition. Last night the fever was less than on any night since he was wounded, and his temperature was about normal. The most hopeful symptom seems to be the improvement of the President's appetite and the excellent condition of his stomach. The parotid gland was found to have another opening into the mouth, and its appearance showed that it was rapidly diminishing in size. The wound was discharging more freely and the granulating process is proceeding favorably. The President is anxious to leave the White House, and the physicians will, as soon as he is able to move, send him either to Long Branch by rail, or for a trip down the river on the Tallapoosa. The patient begins to express disappointment at being unable to keep his engagements for September.

One of the attending physicians says the public has been deceived as to the President's condition at the time he was wounded. At the time he was shot his physical condition was bad. He was like a grass-fed horse. He had been suffering from dyspepsia, hemorrhoids, and had borne an operation for fistula on the lower bowel. This, with the great mental strain and the anxiety on account of his wife's illness, had run him down so that his physical condition was very unfavorable to meet the shock and subsequent treatment for a gun-shot wound. His loss of flesh has been overstated, and cannot be more than forty pounds.

Guiteau wrote a letter to District Attorney Corkhill yesterday, expressing great regret that he did not kill the President in the Vermont Avenue church when he went there for that purpose. The villain says he is sorry the President suffers so much, but a great deal more sorry that the President is not dead.

WASHINGTON, Sept. 2.

The President has not improved much in the last twenty-four hours. He held his own, however, the physicians say, and although, he did not gain strength enough to help himself, he looked better, his voice was stronger and he talked more. The condition of the wound did not improve, and the physicians think it will not until the gland is better. The patient chewed a piece of chicken yesterday and swallowed the juice; he also swallowed the juice of a piece of beefsteak, and took a little oyster soup in addition to the usual amount of liquid nourishment. The fluctuations of the patient's pulse are attributed to weakness. When he grows weary or his wound is dressed there is an immediate rise in the pulse. The question of the President's removal was discussed by the physicians yesterday, but no action was determined on.

There is one disquieting feature of the case which accounts possibly for his high temperature, and that is, that the stomach is not doing its work, the food does not assimilate, and there is consequently no increase in strength.

It is said that the members of the Cabinet have several times discussed the feasibility of calling upon Vice President Arthur to attend to executive business until the President recovers, but no one is yet ready to advise this step.

Doubtful Praise.

The late Archduke Francis Charles of Austria, father of the present Emperor and brother-in-law of the great Napoleon, when Ferdinand made over the crown to him in 1818, declined the honor in favor of his son with these words: "I am a good Viennese citizen, but I would make a bad Emperor." The Archduke had a sharp tongue when occasion demanded. The brilliant but conceited pianist, Leopold von Meyer, once played before him a difficult composition, to the rather too-evident satisfaction of the pianist himself. It was very warm, and Herr von Mayer was somewhat exhausted by his exertions. His heated face and unlimited conceit were too much for the Archduke, and when the artist, with manifest self-complacency, looked to him for praise, Francis Charles sarcastically said: "I have heard Thalberg, and I have listened to Liszt (profound bow from the pianist), and I must say that neither of those eminent artists (here Herr Mayer executed the most obsequious of salutations)—I repeat it, that neither of those famous masters—perspired half as freely as you do."

A Sure Remedy.

There is no remedy for trouble equal to hard work—labor that will tire you, physically, to such an extent that you must sleep. If you have met with losses, you don't want to lie awake and think about them. You want sleep—calm, sound sleep, and to eat your dinner with an appetite. But you can't unless you work. If you say you don't feel like work, and go loafing all day to tell Tom, Dick and Harry the story of your woes, you'll lie awake, and keep your wife awake by your tossing, spoil your temper and your breakfast next morning, and begin to-morrow feeling ten times worse than you do to-day. There are some great troubles that only time can heal, and perhaps some that can never be healed at all; but all can be helped by the great panacea, work.

ADDITIONAL NEWS.

Benjamin D. Butler, a son of Gen. B. F. Butler, died at the residence of his father, near Gloucester, Mass. The young man was in his 27th year, and was a general favorite. He graduated at West Point in 1876. He afterward studied law, and was about to enter his father's office this fall. He was his father's favorite son.

When the east-bound express on the Central Pacific road reached Colfax, Cal., two engines and one car were thrown from the track, the rails having been removed by highwaymen. A fireman and the express messenger, who sprang to the ground, were ordered to keep quiet, but just at that moment the robbers became alarmed and rode off in a wagon, leaving a large invoice of masks, powder and tools.... The Convent of St. Francis, situated about five miles from Manitowoc, Wis., was struck by lightning and entirely destroyed by fire. There were over eighty persons in the building, several of whom were injured in their efforts to escape. The loss on the building and furniture was $65,000, with insurance of only $6,000..... The receipts of live stock in Chicago for the month were 152,236 cattle, 455,259 hogs, 30,423 sheep and 957 horses. These figures show an increase over the receipts of August, 1880, of 40,779 cattle, 2,985 hogs, 11,872 sheep and 223 horses. Prices of beef cattle are now from 50 cents to $1 per 100 pounds higher than one year ago, while the difference in hogs is from $1.50 to $1.60..... The banks of the Illinois river, all the way from Pekin to Peoria, are strewn with dead fish, and gangs of men are employed in burying them. The cause is believed to be the refuse from the glucose works and distilleries of Peoria....An insane man lodging on Clark street, in Chicago, sprang from his bed at about 1 o'clock in the morning and shot David Fagin, a room-mate, and William Springard, a watchman. Making for the sidewalk, he hit Henry Johnson, a negro. Along the Rock Island track he wounded Thomas Flynn, a flagman, and a man named Wolf. The lunatic was caught. Some of his victims are dangerously wounded, and one or two will probably die.

A telegram from Little Rock, Ark., says: "The worst feeling imaginable still prevails at Center Point, Howard county, between blacks and whites. Several riots have already occurred, attended with loss of life. On Monday a well-to-do negro named Anderson Smith appeared in town, got intoxicated, and was roughly handled by two white men. Next day he returned with a squad of thirty or forty negroes, and this force was met by a body of white men on the outskirts of the town. A regular battle occurred. The negroes were driven into a barn, and after several hours retreated to the woods. Several were killed. Center Point is off from the telegraph line, and particulars are meager. Colored people have repeatedly threatened to burn the town, which is guarded day and night."

Rufus Hatch says that the receipts of wheat at the four principal winter-wheat points—St. Louis, Toledo, Indianapolis and Detroit—are only 40 per cent. of what they were last year. He infers from this fact that the wheat crop of this year is only about 40 per cent. of what it was last year. Mr. Hatch thinks that no such calamity as the short crop of this year has been experienced in the United States for twenty-five years....A clergyman of Dayton, Ohio, writes to the authorities of Richmond, Va., that he united in marriage an estimable lady and Morton, the bigamist, the latter giving the name of Lieut. Gov. Miller, of Minnesota. This is the fifteenth matrimonial victim of the prisoner....An application is before the Dominion Government for a charter for a telegraph system throughout Canada in harmony with the Mutual Union, with a capital of $1,000,000.

The setting of course 230 on the Washington monument has been finished, making a net addition to the height of the monument since the work of continuation was resumed of eighty feet. The last four courses, each weighing about 170 tons, have been laid at the rate of a course every two days. The iron work and machinery will now be shifted, when the work of laying the stone will be prosecuted to course 250, when it will be necessary to make another shipment. There are 100 stonecutters at work, and it is probable that before the work closes for the season the monument will have reached a height of 260 feet.

The Underground World of England.

The proposed tunnel between England and France under the Channel has suggested the preparation of some interesting statistics in regard to what may be called the underground world of England. According to these figures the number of persons employed in English mines, many of whom live in them constantly, is more than three hundred and seventy thousand; in other words, there are men, women and children below the surface of British soil sufficient to form one of its largest cities of the second rank. The length of tunnelling in which they labor is set down at the extraordinary figure of nearly fifty-nine thousand miles. The deepest gallery is at the level of twenty-eight hundred feet. These facts and figures are adduced in support of the practicability of constructing and operating the Channel tunnel. The depth of the Channel, it seems, is nowhere more than one hundred and eighty feet, and taking this as a basis it is estimated that the lowest part of the tunnel would not be more than two hundred feet from the surface. If the engineer's figures and theories be correct the project is not only practicable but simple.—New York Herald.

A LARGE barn on the farm of the heirs of Col. Pierce, in Shelby county, was accidentally set fire to by two children, and was entirely destroyed. Loss, $3,000, with no insurance.

IT is now conceded that the "small boy" caused all of the recent incendiary fires in Jeffersonville. The fires generally have occured in day time, and those in the evening have been before bed time.

WHILE a young son of a widow named Talkington, residing in Shelby county, was carelessly handling a revolver, the weapon was discharged, killing instantly a little brother, 6 years old, who was standing by.

THE railroad election held in Shelby county, to decide whether an appropriation of $81,000 would be donated to the Knightstown and Toledo Company, resulted in a severe defeat to the railroad, every township going heavily against it.

A LITTLE 5-year-old girl died at Evansville from the effects of having swallowed two nickels. The nickels were swallowed several weeks ago, and three or four days later she began to be ill, and since that time has pined, and all the physicians could do for her was of no avail.

THE extensive flouring-mill of Charles Bapp, in Terre Haute, has been totally destroyed by fire. In the mill were 325 barrels of flour and 4,000 bushels of wheat, all of which was consumed. The loss on building and stock will aggregate $18,000. Insured for $5,000.

Two men named Davis, who recently came to Wabash county from Kansas, mysteriously disappeared a few days ago, and have not since been heard from. The clothing of the missing men was found in a piece of woods where they had worked. Foul play is feared.

JOHN BRITTON, who fatally stabbed James Heater at a picnic, in Brown county, some weeks ago, was lately captured near Union City, Mich., after a long and tedious search by the Sheriff of Brown county. Britton is a notorious and dangerous character, and the murder was most cold-blooded and unprovoked.

W. W. METCALF, an agent for Dun's mercantile agency, has absconded from Rockport with considerable money belonging to that concern. The cause of this strange action is attributed to bad associates and indulging too freely in wines. Mr. Metcalf has heretofore been considered one of the leading attorneys in Rockport, and his fall has astonished the citizens of that burg.

A DISTRESSING accident happened on the farm of Albert Dobbins, near Shelbyville. About 3 o'clockin the morning Mr. Dobbins was awakened by some noise near the back-door which he supposed was a predatory dog, owned by one of his neighbors. Picking up his shot-gun he went to the threshold, and, seeing something white, fired a heavy load of shot at the object, which proved to be little Daisy Burns, a 10-year-old girl who was visiting the family, and who had gone out during the night unaware. The child was shot through the left shoulder, producing quite a serious wound.

THE South Bend Tribune relates this amusing incident: A boozy fellow sat on the iron railing just north of the postoffice, and, losing his balance, fell over backward. He struck the back of his head with such force on the stairway, about half way down, as to break one of the iron steps in two. He rolled down into the basement and picked himself up with the remark to a number of bystanders, who had witnessed the somersault: "I tell ye, fellows, 'sno use talking. I come from good stock. Takes suthin' stronger 'n iron to phase this old head, bet yer life."

IN a recent speech at Indianapolis' says the Journal of that city, Gov. Porter referred to the old law for the confinement of debtors within certain limits. A poor fellow in this fix was said to be "in the bounds," but he dared not go beyond them, or if he did he was liable to arrest and imprisonment in jail. Not a few residents of Indiana can recollect the time when this law was in force, and some few are yet alive who were sufferers from it. But it may fairly be presumed that at that time such a law was not so onerous as it would be now. There are fewer inducements and facilities for travel. It was not the habit then to take a summer vacation or to go junketing a thousand miles away. In fact, so horrible were the old corduroy roads that the whole population was "in the bounds" ex necessitate most of the time. Reference to this old law reminds us of our wonderful progress. Now not infrequently the creditor is "in the bounds," hard at work to repair his losses from bad debts, while the debtors roam around the country careless, happy and free. Another law which our hard-hearted fathers enforced is also referred to by Gov. Porter. It was that providing for the sale of paupers. It is a question yet whether those shrewd old fellows did not know a thing or two, primitive as were their habits and notions. We do not hear of any tramps in those days. There were no poor-houses crowded with unfortunates or vagrants. Evidently in those days the people of Indiana had less of the milk of human kindness about them, but yet a rugged sense of justice and right which saved them much annoyance. They had prompt measures for criminals, and were not shocked when a horse-thief or murderer was hung. Justice was stern and prompt, and crime was not profitable as now. Juries were not given to sentimentalism. If they pitied anybody it was the people who suffered, not the outlaws that lived upon them.

Republicans Advocating Repudiation.

The Republicans' bargain with Mahone, made last March, gave them control of the committees of the Senate. In return for his aid, Mahone was allowed to name the candidates for Secretary and Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, in order that he might control the patronage attaching to those offices. An attempt was made to cover up this disgraceful alliance by the pretence that Mahone, the repudiator, was leading a liberal movement in Virginia.

Influenced by this example, and by the efforts of officeholders asserting that they spoke for the administration, the Republican Convention at Lynchburg surrendered to Mahone and adopted his candidates.

The first joint discussion between Mr. Cameron, candidate of the coalition, and Mr. Daniel, candidate of the Democrats, for Governor, took place at Harrisonburg last Monday. The Baltimore Sun reports Mr. Cameron's words as follows:

> He and his party were before the people as advocates of the financial measure known as the Riddleberger bill, passed by the last Legislature, and vetoed by the Democratic Governor, Gen. Holliday. He claimed great credit for the Readjusters in defeating the provisions of the bill known as the McCulloch bill, for paying the debt by agreement with the creditors, when brought before the people in the Legislative canvass of 1879. His estimate of the public debt of the State was based upon the figures published some time since in the Richmond Whig, which fixed the sum upon which the party was willing to pay 3 per cent. at $19,400,000.

When Mr. Cameron was editor of the Petersburg Index-Appeal he put the amount of the debt at $50,000,000, and said that, in order to pay it, he would "take the last pound of flesh, the last drop of blood."

On the same day Mr. Blair, candidate of the coalition for Attorney General, spoke at Fairfax Court House. He said that he was a Democrat, but "not that kind of a Democrat that made him a Funder—that is, a debt-payer." This is the same Blair who, after the passage of the Riddleberger bill, wrote in a public letter as follows:

> Having achieved a great triumph in the State on our view of the debt issue, I now favor a vigorous application of the readjustment principles to the national debt.

In other words, he wanted to strike off about $800,000,000 of the national debt by applying to it the Riddleberger scaling process.

When Mahone started the Readjuster movement in 1879, to revenge himself upon the Democracy for refusing to make him Governor, he made an elaborate speech in Richmond. The following extract has interest now:

> I would use my best endeavors to secure a vote of the people sanctioning a settlement at 3 per cent., for forty-five years, on the basis of $32,977,090.02.

He was particular even to the cents. Well, a Readjuster Legislature was elected, and made him a United States Senator. It passed the Riddleberger bill, which proposed to steal from the creditors of the State one-third of the debt acknowledged by Mahone. Concerning that scheme, we are glad to have had the opinion of our esteemed contemporary, the Times, on the 4th of March, 1880, after the bill had passed the Legislature:

> The time between Saturday and Monday was used to the best advantage by the leading Readjusters, and on the latter day, much to the surprise of those who, from their success on Saturday, had predicted the complete triumph of the debt-payers, the Repudiaton bill was passed by the aid of the colored members. By the provisions of the measure in question, the principal of the debt is reduced to $20,000,000, and the interest to 3 per cent. Further than this, it is provided that the bonds shall be taxed, that the interest coupons shall not be receivable for State taxes, and, worst of all, that the sinking fund, established under the constitution for the ultimate payment and extinguishment of the debt, shall be abolished. In other words, the bill repudiates nearly one-half of the just and legally contracted debt of Virginia, and makes no provision for the payment of that portion of it which remains. The only hope of the bondholders is that the Governor will veto the bill. That he will be brave enough to do so, thereby incurring the lasting hostility of the Readjusters, there is, it is feared, some reason to doubt.

The present Democratic Governor, Gen. Holliday, vetoed this repudiation bill, but he got no thanks for that act from the professed friends of the creditors. Mr. Cameron publicly proclaims that this plundering project is the vital issue of the campaign; and the Republican party sustains him, and respectable Republican journals advocate his election.

Paper-making Politicians.

In his recent speech at Saratoga, Warner Miller said "it seemed natural for paper makers to go into politics." He did not tell the association that William A. Russell of Massachusetts and himself, both members of the last House, both re-elected to the present Congress, and both manufacturers of paper on a large scale, went before the Committee of Ways and Means to prevent any change in the tariff which would disturb the price of paper.

Petitions had been sent in from every State in the Union asking that the onerous and unjust duties levied on wood, straw and other pulp, and upon soda ash, principally made abroad, should be abolished, so that the door of competition in the manufacture of paper might be opened wide to enterprise and industry.

Miller and Russell, who were then, as now, enjoying special privileges and enormous profits by heavy taxation on newspapers, school books and Bibles, exerted all the political and the personal influence derived from membership to defeat this popular demand.

In order to accomplish their object, combinations were formed with different interests by threatening them with hostile legislation unless they made common cause to prevent any change in the duty on paper. Other persuasive arguments, too common at Washington, may also be imagined.

The existing tariff favored huge monopolies. It was passed in the confusion that followed a civil war, when schemes of reconstruction were agitated. In war or in peace, the interested parties never lost sight of the main chance; and their patriotism was stimulated in proportion to the increase of their privileges and of their profits.

With this success in the last Congress, Mr. Miller now finds it "natural for paper-makers to go into politics." It is a paying business—far better than office-holding or any other that he can now engage in, with money wanting permanent takers at 3 per cent. a year. By adroit management in a House of 293 members, Messrs. Miller and Russell, representing a rich monopoly in the manufacture of paper, were able to stop the desired change of duties which yield only a nominal revenue and are maintained solely to exclude competition in that branch of industry.

Mr. Russell is a member of the present House, with a Republican majority committed to special interests. Any Speaker on that side, East or West, will pack the Ways and Means adversely to reform of the tariff. If there should be a close vote, Mr. Russell knows how obstacles may be removed. Places on that important committee are openly sought, because they may be turned to valuable account by corrupt members. It has been publicly charged that $100,000 was paid by sugar manufacturers in the last Congress to prevent adverse legislation.

If Mr. Miller should be allowed to take a seat in the Senate without question, he will have a much smaller sphere for his active ability as a manipulator of legislation. He will be sure of a hearty welcome by the corporation Senators. The Finance Committee organized at the recent extra session excludes any reasonable hope of escape from existing tariff abominations.

With the Senate and the House of Representatives in Republican hands, corporate power and manufacturing monopoly will have full swing. And with the Executive and the Supreme Court standing behind this combination the country may know what to expect.

Therefore, without any reference to political considerations, it is of the first consequence that the rights of Messrs. Miller and Lapham should be investigated before they are allowed to take seats in the United States Senate. If their credentials are smirched, that fact should be examined with care.—New York Sun.

Growth of Telegraph Monopoly.

The rise and progress of the Western Union Telegraph Company is thus set forth in a prospectus issued by a rival company. Beginning as the House Printing Telegraph Company, with a capital of $360,000. On the first of January, 1863, by stock bonuses, and the purchase of other lines, its capital was increased to $3,000,000. On the 2d of March, 1863, this was watered by exactly doubling its capital and presenting the additional shares to stockholders, thus raising it to $6,000,000. May 28, 1864, it was further increased, by purchase and extension of lines, $5,000,000, making its capital $11,000,000, and at the same time the whole of its stock was again doubled by an issue of 100 per cent. bonus to its stockholders, making its capital $22,000,000. From this period up to January, 1868, it took in the United States Telegraph Company at $3,333,333, and absorbed the American Telegraph Company, with a capital of only $2,000,000, taking it in at $11,818,800, and by bonuses and extensions of lines, etc., its capital was increased to $41,008,800; and then it absorbed the Atlantic and Pacific Telegraph Company, whose lines cost more than $2,500,000, and the American Union Telegraph Company, with its lines, which cost little more than $2,000,000, taking them in at $25,000,000, and at the same time issuing a stock bonus of $5,000,000, thus bringing its capital up to $80,000,000. In addition to all this it sank $3,000,000 in the abandonment of the Russian Telegraph, and nearly as much by the abandonment of the California lines and contracts parallel to the Pacific railroad, and it borrowed $5,000,000 for the purchase of real estate in New York, and pays $75,000 per annum rental for the California State Telegraph Company; $85,000 per annum rental for the Illinois State Telegraph Company; purchased a majority of the Pacific and Atlantic, Southern Atlantic, and Franklin Telegraph Companies, and guarantee perpetual dividends on the minority of the stock; leased the Northwestern Telegraph Company, and pays a large rental on a stock and bonded capital of nearly $4,000,000, besides rentals of other leased lines, making its capital really about $100,000,000. The increase in the volume of its business and the amount of its earnings have kept pace with its increase of capital, until now its traffic is over 30,000,000 of messages, gross receipts over $15,000,000, and net earnings over $6,000,000 per annum; and all this with no improvement in method and but little improvement in appliances over the first line constructed forty years ago; moreover, this gigantic monopoly, touching and influencing every branch of commerce and industry, is controlled by one man, whose sole object is self-aggrandizement.

A Hot Climate.

A British officer's wife in Burmah describes the climate by this incident: "A friend gave my husband some owl's eggs, which he left in a plate in the drawing-room, the coolest place in the house, being in the center and surrounded by other rooms. The eggs were on a table in the corner, and were forgotten. Some days after I saw one of the eggs moving, and slightly chipped. Presently out came a little owlet. The other eggs followed suit, till they were all hatched. This may seem impossible to any one who has not lived where the thermometer is generally 105 degrees!"

Daniel Webster's First Plea.

Ebenezer Webster, father of Daniel, was a farmer. The vegetables in his garden suffered considerably from the depredations of a woodchuck whose hole and habitation was near the premises. Daniel, some 10 years old, and his brother had set a trap, and at last succeeded in catching the trespasser. Ezekiel proposed to kill the animal and end at once all further trouble with him; but Daniel looked with compassion upon his meek, dumb captive, and offered to let him go. The boys could not agree, and each appealed to their father to decide the case. "Well, my boys," said the old gentleman, "I will be the Judge and you shall be the counsel to plead his case for and against his life and liberty."

Ezekiel opened the case with a strong argument, urging the mischievous nature of the animal, the great harm he had already done, said that much time and labor had been spent in his capture, and now, if suffered to go at large, he would renew his depredations and be cunning enough not to be caught again, and that he ought now to be put to death; that his skin was of some value, and that, make the most of him they could, it would not repay half the damage he had already done. His argument was ready, practical and to the point, and of much greater length than our limit will allow us to occupy in relating the story. The father looked with pride upon his son, who became a distinguished jurist in his manhood.

It was his first case. Daniel saw that the plea of his brother had affected his father, the Judge; and his large, brilliant black eyes rested upon the soft, timid expression of the animal, and he saw it trembled with fear in its narrow prison-house. His heart swelled with pity, and he appealed with eloquent words that the captive might go free. God, he said, had made the woodchuck; He made him to live, to enjoy the bright sunshine and pure air, the fields, the woods. God had not made him or anything in vain. The woodchuck had as much right to live as any other living thing; he was not a destructive animal, like the wolf; he simply ate a few common vegetables, of which they had plenty, and could well spare a part; he destroyed nothing except the little food he ate to sustain his humble life; and that the food was as sweet to him and as necessary to his existence as was to them the food on their mother's table. God furnished their own food. He gave them all they possessed, and would they not spare a little for a dumb creature who really had as much right to his small share of God's bounty as they themselves had to their portion? Yes, more, the animal had never violated the laws of his nature, or the laws of God, as man often did, but strictly followed the simple instincts he had received from the Creator of all things. Created by God's hands, he had a right from God to food, to liberty, and they had no right to deprive him of either. He alluded to the mute but earnest pleading of the animal for that life as dear to him as was their own, and the just judgment they might expect if, in selfish cruelty and cold-heartedness, they took the life they could not restore again.

During the appeal the tears had started in the old man's eyes, and were running down his sunburnt cheeks. Every feeling of a father's heart was stirred within him, and he felt that God had blessed him beyond the lot of common men. His pity was awakened by the eloquent words of compassion and the strong appeal for mercy; and, forgetting the Judge in the man and the father, he sprang from his chair (while Daniel was in the midst of his argument, without thinking he had already won his case), and turning to his eldest son, dashing the tears from his eyes, he exclaimed, "Zeke, Zeke, you let that woodchuck go!"

THE average life of a lawyer is about five years in Ohio—then they reform and remove to some other State.

A Costly Tomb.

Mr. John B. Bowman, of Cuttingsville, Vt., is mentioned as having built one of the most magnificent tombs in the country. It is erected in memory of his wife and daughter and cost nearly $75,000. It is in the shape of an Athenian temple, the outside being granite and the inside marble. At the entrance stands a life-size statue of Mr. Bowman, in the most advanced style of modern realism, with hat and gloves in one hand, and a wreath of immortelles in the other.

A MAN in Dresden has discovered a new lubricant for shafts, which he claims is superior to the best oil. It is made by mixing the whites of eggs with the finest graphite powder, until of the form of dough. The mixture is then boiled in water until the whole is coagulated, when it is reduced to powder.

THE PASTILLE
Prof. Harris' Radical Cure
Trade Mark
FOR NERVOUS DEBILITY

BY YEARS OF USE!

A valuable Discovery and New Departure in Medical Science. A positively effective Remedy for the speedy and permanent Cure for organic weakness—the deplorable disease resulting from indiscreet practices or excesses in youth or at any time of life—by the only true way, viz: Direct Application acting by Absorption, and exerting its specific influence on the Vesicles, Ducts, and Gland, that are unable to perform their natural functions while this disease pervades the human organism. The use of the Pastille is attended with no pain or inconvenience, and does not interfere with the ordinary pursuits of life; it is quickly dissolved and soon absorbed, producing an immediate soothing and restorative effect upon the nervous organizations wrecked from vicious habits or excesses, stopping the drain from the system, restoring the mind to health and sound memory, removing the Dimness of Sight, Confusion of Ideas, Aversion to Society, etc., etc., and the appearance of premature old age usually accompanying this trouble, and restoring the vital forces, where they have been dormant for years. This mode of treatment has stood the test in very severe cases, and is now a pronounced success. Drugs are too much prescribed in this trouble, and, as many can bear witness to, with but little if any permanent good. There is no nonsense about this Preparation. Practical observation enables us to positively guarantee that it will give satisfaction. It has been in general use for several years and we have thousands of testimonials from patients, as to its value, and it is now conceded to be the most rational means yet discovered for reaching and curing this very prevalent trouble, that is well known to be the cause of untold misery to so many, and upon whom quacks prey with their useless nostrums and big fees. The Remedy is put up in neat boxes, of three sizes. No. 1, (enough to last a month,) $3; No. 2, (sufficient to effect a permanent cure, unless in severe cases,) $5; No. 3, (lasting over three months, will restore those in the worst condition,) $7. Sent by mail, in plain wrappers. Full DIRECTIONS for using will accompany EACH BOX.

Send for Sealed Descriptive Pamphlets giving Anatomical Illustrations and Testimony, which will convince the most skeptical that they can be restored to perfect health, and the vital forces thoroughly re-established same as if never affected. Sold ONLY by

A BAG OF COIN

A STORY SHOWING THAT IT IS WORSE TO SELL THAN TO BUY A PIG IN A POKE.

Recently Moritz Eichler, the proprietor of a garden near Burnet Woods Park, desired to purchase some shells, and one day he happened to mention the fact to a man he met on Pearl street. The man referred to, is the proprietor of a small shop on Court street, below Mound, and he informed Mr. Eichler that if he would accompany him to the above locality he would sell him a lot of shells. Mr. Eichler agreed to go and buy the shells, and the two went to the Court-street shop in Mr. Eichler's wagon. Arrived at the little shanty, two barrels half-filled with shells were found on the pavement. The owner stated that he had the shells for two years, and as they were dead stock he would sell the lot for $3.50. He wanted to quit the shell business anyhow, and would be only too glad to get rid of the old shells at any price—in fact, he had nearly made up his mind to throw them away.

Mr. Eichler willingly bought the shells, but having room for only one of the barrels in his wagon, put but one in the vehicle.

"I wish you would take them all along with you," said the man who owned the little curiosity shop. "We can empty these in this barrel," pointing to the one on the pavement, "into the barrel in the wagon."

"All right," responded Mr. Eichler. The merchant called a man, and the two emptied the shells from one barrel to the other, as suggested, and as they did so a good sized bag was noticed on the top of the full barrel, it having been at the bottom of the half-barrel.

"I didn't sell that!" exclaimed the shell merchant, as he grabbed the mysterious bag. "I sold only the shells."

The man added that he thought there was money in the bag, and the party went into the little shop to examine the contents. When the bag was opened eight or ten pounds of silver and gold coins were found therein. A smaller bag was found inside of the outer one, and this also was filled with coins, as was also a handkerchief found in the lucky bag. There was over $500 in money in the lot, and Mr. Eichler's excitement and chagrin may be imagined when he saw how near he came to drawing such a rich prize. The shell merchant insisted that Mr. Eichler had no claim to the coins, and declared that he would not surrender them. As there were two against one, Mr. Eichler had nothing to do but drive home, swearing at his ill luck. The shop-keeper told him, however, that he remembered the person from whom he had bought the shells in New Orleans, and that he would send the money back to him. Doubtless, however, he will bore a hole in each coin and tie a stout string in each hole before he sends them.

How did the bag of coin get into the barrel? Somebody put it there, of course, but who did so, and when? The shop-keeper said that he had bought the barrels of shells two years ago. Was the bag there all the time? If the treasure was secreted there while the barrels were in New Orleans, did some of the followers of the famous Italian brigand, lately arrested in this country, and who resided so long in New Orleans, hide it in that barrel after robbing somebody? Or did some family place it there during the yellow fever epidemic in order to ship it north in fancied security? In that case it is to be presumed that the owner or owners of the money died without revealing to any one the secret of the old barrel. Or was the wealth in question placed in the barrel since its arrival in this city? Has anybody been robbed of a lot of gold and silver in the city lately, and if there has been such a robbery would the thief go to the trouble to bury the plunder in a barrel of old shells and not call for it again? Has the thief been sent to prison for complicity in some other robbery and thus prevented from recovering this swag? Here is a very pretty little mystery that the detectives might practice on while they have nothing else to do. Doubtless the proprietor of the little shop is nearly dead of anxiety to find the real owner of the coin. He is an honest and philosophical gentleman, and certainly will not claim that the money found in the barrel is his because he didn't buy the gold and silver when he bought the shells any more than Mr. Eichler did.

A reporter went to see the man who sold the shells, and he stated that he had placed the money in the barrel himself just to play a joke on Mr. Eichler. When asked how long it had been allowed to remain in the barrel, he said he didn't know, but he kept it there sometimes for a couple of weeks at a time. He said the amount was $270. He expressed himself as not being at all uneasy about the matter, as he did not sell the money, but only the shells to Mr. Eichler, and he wouldn't care if Mr. Eichler did sue him for the money. The name of the shop-keeper is Wm. Carroll, an elderly, good-natured, pleasant-spoken man. He says that the same money referred to was stolen from him two or three weeks after the Eichler purchase. The thief was one Mike Bolan, who was arrested and is now lying in jail awaiting trial. Part of the money which was recovered from Bolan is at the court house now in the custody of the prosecuting attorney of the county.

Holloway's Pills.

Never despair—something that never fails—Fever and Ague—To the sick it is of little consequence how they are cured, whether from a rational view of the disease or by the rules defined for the guidance of the profession, so long as the cure is certain and expeditious. To a suffering man the question on the relative merits of quinine or calomel is uninteresting. The faculty may wrangle and discuss their various theories, but Dr. Holloway's treatment dispells doubt ere the disciples of Esculapius have finished the first stage. Holloway's Pills are the only remedies which effect a speedy and radical cure without danger of a relapse. Read the advertisement elsewhere.

How Watches are Made.

It will be apparent to any one, who will examine a SOLID GOLD WATCH, that aside from the necessary thickness for engraving and polishing, a large porportion of the precious metal need is needed only to stiffen and hold the engraved portions in place, and supply the necessary solidity and strength. The surplus gold is actually needless so far as UTILITY and beauty are concerned. In JAMES BOSS' PATENT GOLD WATCH CASES, this WASTE of precious metal is overcome, and the SAME SOLIDITY AND STRENGTH produced at from one-third to one half of the usual cost of solid cases. This process is of the most simple nature, as follows: a plate of nickle composition metal, especially adapted to the purpose, has two plates of SOLID GOLD soldered one on each side. The three are then passed between polished steel rollers, and the result is a strip of heavy plated composition, from which the cases, backs, centres, bezels etc., are cut and shaped by suitable dies and formers. The gold in these cases is sufficiently thick to admit of all kinds of chasing, engraving and enameling; the engraved cases have been carried until worn perfectly smooth by time and use without removing the gold.

THIS IS THE ONLY CASE MADE WITH TWO PLATES OF SODID GOLD AND WARRANTED BY SPECIAL CERTIFICATE.

Our Neighbors.

We are glad to learn that Mr. Starr, of the Hicksville News, has recovered from his recent severe illness.

A young man, named Sickafoose, at work in a saw mill in the south part of Whitley county, was severely hurt by a lath coming in contact with the large saw, and striking him in the side. It penetrated his right lung, but it is thought he will recover.

The Wabash Plaindealer in speaking of the county institute, says: There are fully 150 teachers in attendance. Most of the pedagogues are young men and women, and not a bald or grey headed person among them except Supt. Hutchens. They are a very good looking body, and are evidently heartily enlisted in the work, as their strict attention to the proceedings indicates.

The Angola Herald says: Sam Beight, county treasurer, has put upon exhibition at Carver's drug store a difficult accomplishment in penmanship, consisting of the Declaration of Independence written upon a postal card, every word clear and legible and easily read by the naked eye, including several of the signatures. To give some idea of the feat, we will state that the card contains 1,338 words or 6,633 letters. The title is in capitals, as is also the signatures.

Frank Hill, a thief, gambler and robber, who has been playing poker at Waterloo, Fort Wayne and other places, was captured at Jake Snyder's barn last Saturday morning by Wm. Hosler, Murry Cazier, Jacob Snyder and Deah Iddings and was brought to Kendallville and delivered to our marshal. He was taken before Judge Wildman upon the charge of burglary and taking money. He plead guilty to have taking $18 of Cazier and $97 of Hosler. He was bound over to court under $500 bonds, failing to be able to give that amount he was taken to jail. The money was recovered. He will undoubtedly go to states prison. His age is thirty-one.—[Kendallville News.

The Angola Herald says: Last Thursday, while Mr. Yockey was cutting corn in a field south of the east end of the lake he was suddenly surprised and a little alarmed, by being completely covered with small bird shot and afterward hearing the report of a double barreled shot-gun, fired by the celebrated Dr. Arnold, who was accompanied by William Crubaugh, of Angola. The two men came up a little more alarmed than Mr. Yockey, perhaps, for they were firing at a snipe, and did not see the old gentleman until it was to late. He was immediately taken to the house and a physician sent for. Nearly thirty shots were taken from his flesh and quite a number from his boots and clothing. It has lamed him pretty badly, but he is doing well under the management of Dr. Crain. He has the sympathy of all.

The following extract from a Cedar Beach letter in the Indianapolis Sentinel, will be of interest here. The Mr. Spencer spoken of is no doubt, the genial and whole souled M. V. B. Spencer, county clerk of Allen county: As I retraced my steps, cosy corners, easy hammocks and comfortable logs stared me in the face as if to ask, where are they who so lately sat whispering little nothings into each others ears? In answer, I could only echo with "Old Black Joe". "Gone, all are gone." A little futher on, and the cunning little boats rocking too and fro on the calm bosom of the lake were sobbing aloud, like Rachel mourning for her children because they were not, but mourning, like every other emotion, is of short duration, and a sail boat was just starting off, away and went sailing—sailing—but not with my love. The sailor said it is a fair wind, but a foul sky, and right enough was he. But you may be sure it is not always the good that die young, for we all arrived safely at port. A pleasant and amusing ending to the whole day was in the evening, when the singing began. One man, full of sentiment, couldn't sing unless he stood down on the deck, so, while we stood pouring out our mighty voices upon the mightier deep, "Brother Spencer," of Fort Wayne, a most portly and dignified gentleman, made a misstep, and, as the water is only about fifteen feet deep in that particular spot, you can imagine the condition of his Sunday clothes. Upon the bank above resounded a general laugh and chorus of "who fell in!" In this particular case, as when "the boys" went to Syracuse, the innocent had to suffer for the guilty.

Just now we are having

but appreciating the modesty of all such cases, we kindly withhold names. Captain Jones, of the steamer, "Rozy," has purchased a good piece of land a convenient distance from the Club House, on which he intends to erect, at least four cottages and a dining hall. We all wish him success in his venture, and gladly tender him the entertainment of all excursionists.

Communication.

DURANGO, COL., August 28, 1881.

Your letter was a very pleasant surprise. Always glad to hear from my friends, and take pleasure in answering their letters. Glad to hear of your family's good health. My health is better here, and Alice is greatly improved in health. You have asked many questions, and I will try to answer them, cooly and truthfully, and not over estimate or highly color in my answers. So as not to deceive any one, especially a friend, in the first place, this town is only nine months old, and does more business than Auburn and Waterloo put together. Large brick and stone business houses with brown stone fronts, 100 to 200 feet long, 2 stories high, and everything in grand style. There are lots of men who have made from $5,000 to $25,000 since this town started, of course they had some capital. First-class hotels are coining money. I am told they clear $50 per day. Many merchants make a hundred per cent. on their goods. There are young fellows here, look like mere boys, at the head of a large firm, with perhaps $25,000 to $50,000 stock, and made it in the last few years, by good luck in the mines or by shrewd business management. Money is used recklessly here, and spent freely. They do not squeeze a dime till the goddess of liberty pants for breath, as they do back in the states. Our place polled over six hundred votes in May, at six months' old. And since the advent of railroads, has largely increased in population, and building has been simply immense, beyond description. When I take a look over the city, I say to myself can it be possible, what does all this mean? On both sides we are walled in by towering mountains with a grand and beautiful scenery, and a delightful, pure and invigorating air. Well this people cannot live on mountain scenery and thin air. The question comes up, what does all this bustle and building mean? There must be something that brings in heavy capitalists by the hundreds. They are sharp and shrewd, and know what they are doing. The answer is that it must be the rich mineral locked up in these hills and mountains. The mines that are prospected show rich mineral, and an abundance of it. And moneyed men are gobbling them in very rapidly. The ore pays from $1.00 to $15.00 per ton, and costs 40 cts. per ton to smelt it. The best chance for a poor man is to work by the day, at $4.00. A poor man can do nothing as a rule with a mine. Unscrupulous men with money will jump his claim, and law him till they freeze him out, or compel him to sell out for $5,000 or 10,000, a mine worth a half million. If no other way, draw him into a quarrel, and kill him. I will take no chances in the mines. It is a hard life at best, and a hundred chances to one against a miner. I see I will have to be brief, and will sum up in a nut shell. A man can batch at $3.00 to $4.00 per week, at hotels from $6.00 $18.00 per week. We have the finest fruits in the world, and all kinds in market by the first of July. Cherries, pears, grapes, plums, peaches and apples are shipped from California, and sell from 25 to 60 cents per pound. Vegetables are abundant of our own production. The 15th of August we had turnips that weighed six pounds, cabbage fourteen pounds, onions 28 ounces, potatoes, watermelons etc. are the finest that I ever saw, and their mode of cultivation is very imperfect, yet the soil is rich and impregnated with minerals and alkalies, which cause an excessive growth. Farming land is scarce, but enough to supply the demand. Game is abundant, deer, bear, elk and turkey; the red skins are game also. Climate is delightful, nights cool and refreshing. I sleep under two heavy wool blankets all summer. No sickness of any kind among the temperate and those who care for their health. A good place to winter, not so cold as in Indiana—winter shorter. We are 6,500 feet above the sea; in a beautiful valley twelve miles wide, and the finest town site I ever saw. Lots sell from $150 to $200 and nearly all taken up. Society is classed off. Below the railroad, between it and the river, is a perfect hell on earth, filled up with saloons, gambling holes, dance houses, theaters, hotels and desperadoes, Such scenes as are witnessed here after nightfall will cause a tenderfoot to think he is in purgatory, without the flame. On the opposite side of the railroad comes fine business houses, and respectable ones at that, as you will see anywhere east, and represent a capital of $100,000. The supply at present of business houses is equal to the demand, I think. These houses are on First street. Second, Third, Fourth Fifth and Sixth streets, are dotted over with fine cottage residences, occupied by respectable families, and as good society as you will find anywhere in the east. They are not strictly moral, but a good-hearted and generous people; and there is no trouble getting along with them, if a man minds his own business. I have been here since the 1st of May, and like it very much. Had I come here last fall, I could have made $25,000 with $10,000. Had I $10,000 here now, I could have an income of $2,000 per year. The first week I was in this county. I was down to two cents, and that was a very small capital to commence with. I have had plenty of work at $4.00 per day, and my two cents has grown. I think a man of your cloth is very foolish to stay there and dig around those swamps and stumps, as you and I have done. We have no frogs and mosquitoes to fight here. Splendid spring water. There are two good openings for an artist and dentist just now, soon it will be too late. There are two one-horse canvass-tent photograph galleries in this place now, and the artists are no mechanics, whatever. Were you here tomorrow with a good apparatus, you could make a fortune in a few years, you are just the man for this place. I know your ability, and know what I am talking about, could you drop everything, and take your grip-sack and come at once, I know you would make it, Photographs are $5 per dozen, and think of the amount of work to be done in this place. This is going to be a second Denver. As to the dentist, the chance is equally as good, $5 for extracting and other work in proportion. There is only one here, and he is a young fop and no mechanic, so I think Dick could clear $2,000 the first year, say nothing about good health. I had a good letter from brother Dick last week, and will answer soon. I cannot do justice to you in writing, I have not told you half, and will simply say, come and see. The railroad fare is $75, and the trip will be worth the money. Give my kind regards to your family, and all inquiring friends.

Yours Truly,
T. C. ELSON.

Big Wheat Farm.

THREE TRAIN-LOADS OF WHEAT LEAVING THE DALRYMPLE FARM EVERY DAY THIS MONTH.

(Inter-Ocean.)

FARGO, D. T. Aug. 13.—Can you imagine a wheat field of 30,000 acres? Thirty thousand acres of slender golden stems, each bearing a cluster of yellow beads, bowing and nodding as if in acknowledgment of admiring glances. If you can not fancy such a picture, you perhaps will admit that it must be one of the most sublime and fascinating scenes the human eye can witness.

I stood this morning at the center of the largest farm in the world; the largest piece of territory ever cultivated under the direction of a single man. As far as the eye could reach, north, south, east or west, there was nothing visible but the bluest of blue sky, the reddest of red barns, the great awkward-looking threshers, with their smoke-begrimed engines beside them, the whirring harvesters and miles after miles of wheat. If this farm were half a mile wide, it would reach as far as from Chicago to Milwaukee. If it were in a single rectangular piece, a mile in width, it would be forty-five miles from end to end, and there is not a fence, not a tree, not a bush; only an occasional strip of green across the golden tract marks the existence of a road or section line.

Near us was a little white house, where the "store keeper" lived—the commissary of a great army, for an army it is—and we inquired of the gentlemanly Mr. Mandell how we could get across to the office of Mr. Malrymple. He impressed a mule team that happened to drive up for supplies and sent us to headquarters.

There was a cluster of great red barns, and acre or two of cabbages, beets, onions and waving corn; a lazy looking windmill that swung around as indifferently as if a regiment of thirty men were not working in the field; and a cozy cottage, plain but comfortable. We rapped at the door and were shown into the parlor. The room was handsomely furnished, with some evidences of luxury, but no more than are found in the houses of "fore-handed" farmers all over the west.

HOW DALRYMPLE LOOKS.

We asked for Mr. Darymple, and he came down from some room above, a slender, quiet looking man, with a pen behind his ear, whom you would judge to be a school master or clergyman at sight. His hands were soft and white—more accustomed to the book or pen than the plow—and his face, where it was not covered with beard, was not burned so much as mine. He met us cordially, invited us to spend the day and dine, and suggested that he would have a team hitched up to drive us over "the place."

I noticed he always called it "the place."

In the mean time I ask him a few questions. The first ones to the yield this year.

"It was a late spring," said Mr. Dalymple. "At the time when we are usually putting in a crop the place for miles around us here was covered with water, from the melted snow, and you could have sailed a boat over a field where now there is wheat that will yield thirty bushels to the acre. I feared at one time that the crop would be a failure, but am very positive now that the average per acre will not be below twenty bushels."

"Have you sold your wheat?"

"Our plan is different from the ordinary method. We are sending about three train loads a day to Duluth."

"How many bushels is that?"

"About thirty thousand bushels. We load a vessel at Deluth every two days and send it to Buffalo, where it is sold on arrival at the market price."

"What is that?"

"The price to-day," said he, consulting the telegram, "is $1 27 at Buffalo. Freights are about 27c, so it nets us about $1 a bushel."

"What will your crop amount to?"

"I am expecting about 900,000 bushels. Besides this we have about 90,000 bushels of oats, which we keep for our stock."

"Do you keep stock enough to eat up 90,000 bushels of oats.

Mr. Dalrymple smiled pleasantly and remarked that eight hundred horses and mules ate up a good many oats.

'How much does your crop cost you?'

"It costs us about $6 an acre to produce a crop when we use our own stock and pay our men by the month, but when we hire men and teams by the day it costs us about $8 an acre."

"What do you pay your men?"

"We pay $30 a month for regular hands and $2 per day for extra hands during harvest."

"What amount of machinery have you going to-day?"

"Two hundred self-binding harvesters and thirty steam threshers. These two hundred harvesters cut an average of 2,800 acres a day, and the threshers turn out about 30,000 bushels a day. As fast as it is threshed we bag the wheat, cart it over to the cars, empty the sacks, and send away three train loads daily."

"Where do you keep your men?"

"If you had been here at 5 o'clock this morning you could have seen 800 men at breakfast. We keep quite a hotel, with forty cooks.

Mr. Dalrymple explained at length how this enormous business is conducted. The 30,000 acres under cultivation are divided into five divisions of 6,000 acres each, under superintendents, who are responsible directly to Mr. Dalrymple, the commander-in-chief. Each of these regiments are divided again into battalions, with a foreman or major, who has charge of 2,000 acres. Under him are three companies, each having a captain, and cultivating a section, which is 640 acres of land.

Each superintendent plants his crop and harvests it, reporting from time to time to Mr. Dalrymple, who directs and oversees the whole, but spends the greater part of his time at the office, planning and calculating for the best results from the smallest outlay. The superintendents are responsible for the good order of their men, stock and machinery, and there is a decided rivalry between them as to which can produce the biggest crop.

When the plowing commences in the spring the men go out in gangs, each taking 640 acres, under the direction of a foreman, who rides along on horseback to see that the work is done properly. Everything is military style. It is a battery of plows, instead of artillery, and before starting they are drawn up in line and thoroughly inspected by the foreman and machinist, to see that they are in good order. The plows are all double, and are drawn by four horses. At the word of the captain they start, and go around a field of 640 acres, which is exactly four miles in distance, ten or twelve plows abreast. At the end of the second furrow, eight miles, the plows are left in the soil, the men mount their horses and ride to headquarters for dinner. After the horses are fed they remount, return to the plows and go around the 640 acres two or three times more before supper time. At the close of the day all are inspected again, and, if any repairs are needed, the blacksmith, saddler or farrier make them during the night.

The same routine is followed at seeding time and during the harvest. The self-binding harvesters throw the bundles of ripe grain upon the ground, where they are picked up and placed in large shocks to await the wagons which transport them to threshers, which are always placed as closely as possible to the cars. After threshing, the straw is carried away and burned.

It sounds very large, but it is nevertheless a fact, that the plows and harvesters regularly make a trip four miles without stopping. A furrow eight miles in length is considered a very fair morning's work, but ten miles is nothing for an afternoon's diversion.

THE STORE-KEEPER.

As near the center of the farm as it is convenient a store-house is placed, in charge of a commissary and bookkeeper. Each day the superintendent of a division issues requisitions for supplies of seed, or food, or machinery and these are served upon the storekeeper, who keeps a double-entery set of ledgers for each, and at the end of each day's threshing the crop returns are made to him, so that Mr. Dalrymple, at any time, by examining the books, can ascertain the expenses of every division and the crop it has produced.

The profits can thus be very closely estimated, and an experienced man can guess within a few thousand bushels of the entire crop if he knows the yield of any particular section.

This year it is expected that the 30,000 acres will produce 600,000 bushels of grain. The cost of production averages $7 an acre or $210,000. The wheat is sold at an average net price $1 per bushel, therefore the profit of Dalrymple's little garden in 1881, which is said to be a poor year, will be the difference between $210,000 and $600,000, or the trifle of $390,000; more than 200 per cent. upon the entire investment.

No wonder Mr. Dalrymple smiled when I asked him if he wanted to sell his "place."

WHY STEAM ISN'T USED.

There will be natural inquiry in this connection as to why steam is not used instead of horse power. I asked Mr. Dalrymple. He said:

"We have experimented with steam, but have not found it practicable except in the way of stationary engines; and again oats are cheaper. Wood is very scarce. Coal costs us practically nothing. We sow and reap our oats between times, when the men and stock otherwise would be idle. The costs of horses and mules is no greater than the price of machinery; the wear and tear is less, and during the winter time we send our men and horses to the lumber regions, where they more than pay for themselves."

While the Dalrymple farm is the largest it is also the pioneer of this wonderful wheat country. When Mr. Dalrymple came here, as he told me, there was not acre of plowed land between Fargo and Bismark, a distance of more than 200 miles. The first crop was harvested in 1874, when the entire product of Dakota was but 250,000 bushels. This year a single county, Cass, of which Fargo is the capital, estimating an average crop of twenty bushels to the acre, will produce over 3,000,000 bushels.

Liquid or Dry.

Some people prefer to purchase medicines in the dry state so that they can see for themselves that they are purely vegetable. Others have not the time or desire to prepare the medicine, and wish it already to use.

SKILL IN THE WORKSHOP.—To do good work the mechanic must have good health. If long hours of confinement in close rooms have enfeebled his hand or dimmed his sight, let him at once, and before some organic trouble appears, take plenty of Hop Bitters. His system will be rejuvenated, his nerves strengthened, his sight become clear, and his whole constitution be built up to a better working condition. 2w.

NOTICE.—All persons are hereby notified not to purchase a note purporting to have been signed by me without first seeing me about it. Respectfully,

GIVING AND LIVING.

Forever the sun is pouring its gold
On a hundred worlds that beg and borrow;
His warmth he squanders on summits cold,
His wealth on the homes of want and sorrow;
To withhold his largess of precious light
Is to bury himself in eternal night.
To give
Is to live.

The flower shines not for itself at all,
Its joy is the joy it freely diffuses;
Of beauty and balm it is prodigal,
And it lives in the light it freely loses.
No choice for the rose but glory or doom,
To exhale or smother, to wither or bloom.
To deny
Is to die.

The seas lend silvery rays to the land,
The land its sapphire streams to the ocean,
The heart sends blood to the brain of command,
The brain to the heart its lightning motion;
And over and over we yield our breath,
Till the mirror is dry and images death.
To live
Is to give.

He is dead whose hand is not open wide
To help the need of a human brother;
He doubles the length of his lifelong ride
Who gives his fortunate place to another;
And a thousand million lives are his
Who carries the world in his sympathies.
To deny
Is to die.

"SAUCY EYES."

She came smiling across the fields, her arms laden with hawthorn bloom. Harold Carleton, as he saw her, thought her the very incarnation of spring, she was so young, so fresh, so full of exuberant vitality. Yet she was only a cottager's daughter, apparently, for her dress, though neat, was cheap. She glanced up at him as she passed, with her great, eloquent eyes, half-slyly, half-mischievously.

Harold was fresh from Cambridge, and at 18 thought himself quite in another sphere, even in point of age, from the rustic of 13. He was disposed to be patronizing.

"What's the hurry, little Saucy Eyes?" he said. "Stop and give a fellow a kiss."

"My name isn't Saucy Eyes, and you know it. Gentlemen," and she emphasized the word, "when they speak to me call me Miss Kent."

She had stopped to say this, and she now walked on with head erect and the air of a born Princess.

"Whew!" whistled Harold, "but I've made a mess of it. No cottager's daughter has an accent like that. Who in the deuce can she be? A regular little spit-fire, though."

He ventured to ask the landlord about her, at the small inn where he lodged. He had come to this picturesque, hilly region on a trout-fishing excursion, and he knew no one there.

"O, that's the minister's daughter," was the reply. "Had her arms full of hawthorn, you say? Yes, there's plenty of it about here; one of the few places there is. We've miles of hedge. Miss Kate was taking the bloom home to decorate the parlor. She's a rare one for flowers. You should see her decorate the church at Christmas. All the young ladies give way to her in that, though she is but a child as yet."

"If she grows up as pretty as she is now, she'll make many a fellow's heart ache," said Harold, philosophically, as he helped himself to another brook-trout; and in five minutes more, so excellent was the dinner, he had forgotten all about the child.

Years passed. Harold has taken his degree and was now studying law, the profession of his father, Hugh Carleton, and his grandfather before him. Just before the summer vacation began he had received a letter from home.

"We shall certainly expect you, dear," his mother wrote, "this year, and will take no excuses. It has been two years since you were at home, remember. We have had such an accession, too, to our society. Our new rector is a most excellent man, and has such a charming daughter, a very pretty girl, and so bright, intelligent and high bred."

Now Harold, who had gone the summer before to France and Germany, had thought this year of going to Norway—had almost given his promise, in fact, but at this appeal he wrote back that he would come home and spend the whole vacation at "Inglewood," for that was the name of Hugh Carleton's place.

"Dear mamma, it was so hard on her last year," he said to himself.

The very day that Harold came home the rector went away on a four weeks' visit with his wife, and the last words he said to his daughter, as he got into the carriage, were:

"Good-by, Katie, and don't forget to go up to Squire Carleton's and ask to have the gardener come to see the garden. The Squire told me to send for him only yesterday. With his aid we can manage to keep the garden very nice."

"I suppose I might as well go at once," said Kate, when the carriage had disappeared. "Dear old papa, I am sorry you and ma have gone; but I'm going to have lots of fun, with no one but old Nannie to look after me." And her eyes fairly danced with the mischief of 18.

Harold Carleton himself was in the garden when Katie came in. He had arrived unexpectedly the night before, a week sooner than he had expected. He was fond of a little amateur gardening at times, and was just now bending over a moss-rose bush, hoe in hand. His back was toward Kate, and she, supposing him to be the gardener, called out:

"O, Adam—that's your name, I hear—please ask Mr. Carleton if he can spare you for a couple of hours this afternoon. It's Dr. Kent's, you know, at the rectory."

Harold glanced mischievously at the pretty face half hidden by the tall lilies, which she had stopped to smell as she was speaking. Here was a chance for some sport. Kate had never, probably, seen the new gardener, who had only come two days before. Why could not he personate the old fellow? It was fortunate for him that he had an old coat on, he thought.

So, calling Adam, he took the old man into the plot, giving him a crown for hush-money, and, in the afternoon, made his appearance at the rectory, and, knocking at the back door, asked for orders.

"O, Adam, is it you?" cried Kate, coming forward. "Let me show you your work. I'll put on my garden hat and be out in a minute."

Harold presented rather a curious appearance as he followed Kate down the long walk. His usually-elegant attire had been exchanged for a jacket and trousers of coarse jeans, and his dark curling hair was covered by a red wig, similar in color to Adam's fiery locks. He had assumed the same shuffling gait, also.

"Here is your work, Adam," said Kate; "tie up the roses, and then weed this bed of hyacinths; train this wistaria, and, if you have any more time, come to me for further orders."

Harold bowed awkwardly, while a mischievous gleam shot from the brown eyes as he proceeded to tie up the wayward roses.

"This is getting interesting," he observed. "I wonder what my next order will be? By George, but Miss Kate queens it well! What a perfect beauty she is! Whew! how hot it is!"

He wiped the perspiration from his heated brow.

"I begin to understand how the original Adam must have felt when commanded to earn his bread by the sweat of his brow. There, the wistaria is tied up. Faith, mum," he said, as Kate reappeared, "I was jist comin' to see whatever else there was to be done."

"How nice you've made things look!" cried Katie, as she glanced at the roses and wistaria. "But it's warm work, isn't it? Adam's your name, I believe. I am glad," affably, "to make your acquaintance, Adam."

"Faith, mum, but it is that same as you say," replied Adam, drawing his straw hat further down over his eyes, still more to hide his face.

"Well, Adam, train up this hedge, and then you may go," she answered, and then swept away.

Several days went by. The pretended Adam never failed to be on hand in the afternoon. But in the morning Harold Carleton, in his own proper person, had fishing, boating and picnic excursions, most of which Katie attended; for by this time the Squire's wife had called, bringing her son, and of course, after that, Katie was included in everything that went on.

Katie, too, learned to like Harold Carleton very much, for no one moer genial or whole-souled ever existed. He was generous to a fault, frank and openhearted as the day, and had outgrown the conceit and coxcombery of his youth.

One morning, when Katie went into the garden unexpectedly, she found Adam fanning himself with his straw hat, which was usually drawn so closely over his eyes, and she caught a quick glance that reminded her of Harold. But it was only for a moment.

He had not seen her, nor did he see her when she quietly seated herself in a vine-covered summer house, and took out some pretty, graceful work with which she soon became quite absorbed.

The long, drowsy afternoon was wearing away. Nothing but the tinkle of the little brook back of the rectory, the sound of the scythe which Adam was wielding, and the murmur of the bees, broke the silence of the place. Suddenly Katie's ear was arrested by a clear, manly voice, singing a bar from a favorite opera, in a rich, ringing tenor.

She started to her feet and looked out. Only last evening she had sung, with Harold Carleton, that very song, and this surely was his voice again. But no one was in sight except Adam, who was industriously hoeing peas. The truth was, Harold, ignorant of Katie's presence, had forgotten himself; but he was now furious at his indiscretion, for he had heard Katie, and knew what called her out.

"Adam, has Mr. Carleton been here?" she asked. "I thought I heard him just now."

"No, mum, it's not yet that I didn't see him," said the apparently stolid Irishman.

"I was sure it was his voice," said Katie, looking just a trifle disappointed.

He would cross-examine Katie a little, and thus discover her real feeling toward himself. So he asked, carelessly, though his whole heart was in her answer:

"Did yes wish to see him, miss? For it's meself as will be afther sinding the likes of him to yes?"

"No," said Katie, decidedly. "Stop talking and go to work. I am afraid you are getting lazy;" and Katie walked off with her most queenly step.

"Whew!" whistled Harold. "She's too bright to be caught in that way. Thinks Adam will tell on her. Getting lazy, am I? Well, it isn't because I don't work hard enough," with a doleful gaze at his blistered hands, as he set vigorously to work, adding: "Even as Adam, I must win the good opinion of my Eve."

The next afternoon Katie went to call on a friend, and Harold discontentedly watched her departure. It was so pleasant to know that she was in the summer-house or about the grounds that he did not like to have her go away.

He did not notice her return, nor that she came to the arbor soon after. But when he had finished his last order he threw himself down on a mossy seat, and, tossing his wig off, began fanning himself vigorously with his straw hat.

"I can't wear that confounded wig any longer!" he exclaimed. "It's color even is enough to set me on fire. Now this is refreshing. Beppo, you scamp, bring back that wig. What if your mistress should come? Must I chase after that dog this scorching day?"

Beppo, Katie's dog, had run off with the wig, as the reader has conjectured, and, on chase being given to him, rushed to the summer-house and laid the wig at his mistress' feet.

"Why, Beppo, what have you there?" she cried. "It looks like the scalp of old Adam. I wonder if—"

And she broke into a fit of ringing laughter as she met the astonished Harold face to face.

"Mr. Carleton!"

"Miss Katie!"

Then, unable to resist it, he also broke into a hearty laugh.

"O, so you're not Adam," said Katie, demurely, at last.

"No, but I will be if you'll only be my Eve!" he cried, with a touch of his old boyish impudence. "O, Katie! Miss Kent, darling, I've learned to love you so dearly—say you will. We'll make another paradise where we can be happy together, and I shan't be obliged to work so hard," breaking into laughter as he saw Katie's roguish look, and wiped his dripping forehead.

"Very well," said Katie, "I'll think of it. But you must remember that it was not a woman who made trouble in the garden this time." And she added, archly, "But I'll forgive you for deceiving me, if you will forgive me for—for—"

"For what?" asked Harold, as she hesitated.

"For not letting you know before that I guessed your secret. I knew from the beginning that you were not Adam. That first day, when I pretended to be smelling the lilies, I had seen you were at least not a gardener."

"And you let me work all this time? And it was so hot," with a crestfallen look.

"Yes. You deserved it for your trick. But I am glad you can work and obey orders. You may have to do so some time, you know."

"Every man has, they say, when he falls in love," he retorted.

"Yes," she said, saucily, "and you mustn't hope to be an exception. But there, there, isn't that quite enough?" for he was devouring her with kisses. "I declare you're as impudent as you were five years ago."

"Five years ago!"

"Yes. Oh, you've forgotten. Men always do. It is only women who remember."

"What do you mean?"

Her eyes danced with mischief. She was enjoying his perplexity to the full.

"Well, I'll tell you a fairy tale. Once on a time—there, stop now, or I'll never get on—there was a little girl coming across a field with her arms full of hawthorn bloom."

He gave a quick start, and Katie went on demurely.

"And she met an impudent young fellow, a collegian, who thought himself a Prince, but he wasn't. And he called her 'Saucy Eyes,' the conceited—"

"What! You're 'Saucy Eyes,' are you? Oh! I remember it all. Who'd have thought it? Why, it's the jolliest fairy tale I ever heard. Only, then she wouldn't let me kiss her, and now—"

"Now somebody'll get his ears boxed if he doesn't behave himself. One must draw the line somewhere, and half a hundred, surely—"

"Well, since you are so cruel. But when did you first recognize me?"

"The first day I saw you at leisure; the day you called with your mother."

"And," said Harold, reflectively, "there was always something in your face I thought familiar. Yes, after all, you are 'Saucy Eyes.'"

A Brutal King.

The King is rapidly growing mad. He cuts off the noses of those who take snuff, and the lips of those who smoke. The other day a man went to salute Ras Aloula. In saluting him his tobacco box dropped out. Ras Aloula struck him with his sword, and his people finished him. The King is hated more than Theodore was. Cruel to a degree, he does not, however, take life. He cuts off the feet and hands of people who offend him. He puts out their eyes by pouring hot tallow into their ears. Several persons came to me to tell me this. I remonstrated with the King against his edict forcing men to become Christian from Mussulman. He said they wished it. I also remonstrated about the tobacco edict, but it was of no use. No one can travel without the King's order, if he is a foreigner. You can buy nothing without the King's order; no one will shelter you without his order—in fact no more complete despotism could exist. It cannot last, for the King will go on from one madness to another. Orders were given that no one was to approach me; nor was I to speak to any. The officer who conducted me to the King, the second in command to Aloula, met his uncle and cousin in chains, and durst not ask why they were chained. The King is a man of some 45 years, a sour, ill-favored looking being. He never looks you in the face, but when you look away he glares at you like a tiger. He never smiles; his look, always changing, is one of thorough suspicion. Hated and hating all, I can imagine no more unhappy man. Avaricious above all his people, who do not lack his quality, his idea of a free port is that steamers will arrive from the powers of Europe with presents for him, to which he will reply by sending a letter with the lion seal, saying: "You are my brother, my mother, etc. How are you?" * * * You know I have seen many peoples, but I have never met with a more fierce, savage set than these. The peasantry are good enough. The King says he can beat united Europe, except Russia. All the great men do not want a war with Egypt, and the King fears it when sober, for he drinks to excess at night. He talks like the Old Testament. He is of the strictest sect of the Pharisees—drunk over night, at dawn he is up reading the Psalms. He never would miss a prayer-meeting, and would have a Bible as big as a portmanteau if he were in England. No women are allowed within 300 yards of his palace—his hut, I should say. He has one legitimate son—Ras Arya Salam—and one illegitimate. Two sons of Theodore are with him.—From Gordon's Book on "Central Africa."

Long Branch Cottages and Their Cost.

Commodore Garrison's "cottage"—rather, marine villa—cost $70,000; Fahnestock's, of the First National Bank, New York, was bought for $24,000 nearly two years ago, and has cost $15,000 since; Childs' pretty blue cottage cost $18,000 originally; now represents $25,000. Amos Cutting's, on Senator Jones' old lot, cost $35,000; Moses Taylor's cost $40,000, and adding his son-in-law Winthrop's and the two lawns, stands for $125,000. This is one of the Boston Winthrop's. George M. Pullman's cottage and double lawns, on both sides of the drive, represents $67,500. Murphy's cottage and grounds, also double, cost in flush times, $70,000; the stable cost $12,000, and the billiard hall $10,000; The numerous small cottages around the Elberon Hotel cost in dull years $2,250 to $4,000 apiece. Judge Hilton's purchase south of the Elberon Hotel, 350 feet by 800 feet, cost him recently $30,000, or $100 per front foot. He bought it of V. Newcombe, who made $8,000 by the operation. Hilton has also got 600 feet across the road on both sides, bringing his purchase up to $65,000. It is guessed he designs to build some time a hotel here.

Mr. Alcott told the Concord Summer School of Philosophers that "Actuality is the Thingness of the Here." The information almost paralyzed them. For years they had been laboring under the misapprehension that the hereness of the actuality is the thing. But it is no such thing.—Norristown Herald.

ANCIENT MILLIONAIRES.

The Vanderbilts, Jay Goulds and Astors of Antiquity.

Thousands of men have envied Astor, Stewart, Vanderbilt, Mackey, Keene, Gould and the other fellows who can buy strawberries at $1 per box; but the richest of them are mere vagrants when compared to some of the ancients. There was Ninus, for instance. He was the son of Nimrod, the old hunter, who made the lions scratch for holes and tigers take to ditches. Old Nim left his boy about £130,000,000 in cash, besides 120,000 cattle, a piece of land about as big as Arkansas, and 14,000 likely slaves. There were no lawyers in those days who made a specialty of breaking wills, and young Ninus quietly took possession and cast about for some plan to keep himself out of the poor-house.

He was considered a poor young man, and had he been seen lugging his girl to an ice-cream saloon or riding out in a livery rig his friends would have said he would bring up in a garret. By a lucky capture of territory from the Assyrians, together with 20,000 slaves, 125,000 cattle, ten wagon-loads of silver and jewels, and a few other trifles, Ninus walked up the social ladder until big bugs asked after his wife and babies, and he could lose three games of billiards without wondering if the owner of the saloon would take a "stand off." He was worth £350,000,000 when he died, and yet for the last five years of his life he went without mutton because the price had raised to 3 cents a pound.

The heiress with a $50,000 bank account considers herself some pumpkins, but what a 3-cent piece she would have been alongside of Queen Semiramis. She not only had the lucre left by Ninus, but in ten years she had increased it fourfold. Just multiply £350,000,000 by two, and you have the amount of her bank balance, to say nothing of jewels and clothing and furniture and palaces and slaves and cattle. Had she sold out and cleaned up she could have drawn her little check for about £700,000,000. She didn't worry about where her spring bonnet was to come from, and when a new style of dress goods came out she didn't sit up nights for fear some neighbor would secure a pattern first. While she made it lively for her enemies she was soft on her friends. She gave her waiting-maid $500,000 in a lump for dressing her hair in a new style, and she tossed the same amount to her dressmaker as a reward for the excellent fit of one particular dress. One day when she saw a poor old man traveling the highway on foot she presented him with 500 asses to ride on, and insisted on his accepting £50,000 to pay his toll and tavern bills.

Cyrus, King of Persia from the year 538 to 580, had some little change to begin with, and in ten years he could draw his check for £600,000,000. He didn't haggle over the price of a slave when a man came to buy, but presented him with 1,000. He at one time owned 30,000 horses, 40,000 cattle, 200,000 sheep, 15,000 asses and 25,000 slaves, and when he got tired of a palace costing $1,000,000, he gave it away to some poor washwoman with seven children to support. He one day sat down to a dinner which cost £30,000, and in the afternoon he went on £50,000 drunk. The police didn't run him in, or he would doubtless have insisted on paying a fine of £20,000 and presenting his Honor with a corner house and lot in the toniest part of Babylon.

King Menes was another well-heeled man. It was too much trouble to count his cash, and so he weighed it. One day when an old friend asked him for the loan of a few dollars until Saturday night, he sent him a procession of 60 asses, each animal loaded with 100 pounds of gold coin. He paid £100,000 for a bird which could whistle, the same for a trick dog, and he had such a fondness for white oxen that he shelled out £25,000 apiece for them, and at one time had a drove of 2,000. When he got out with the boys he made things lively. During one spree in his city of Memphis, he gave away £500,000, and didn't get drunk at that. At one time he had 600,000 gold chains, 1,000,000 finger rings, 100,000 costly swords, 300,000 daggers, and land only knows how many fish-lines, jack-knives, cork-screws and tobacco boxes. His wife had £1,000,000 a year as pin money, and when his eldest son went up to Thebes to see the elephant, he was followed by 500 friends, 1,000 slaves, 2,000 horses and £500,000 for fare, checks and beer money.—Detroit Free Press.

The Time Consuming Match.

Mr. Edward Prince, splint manufacturer of Horseshoe Bay, Buckingham Township, is authority for the statement that there are about twenty-two match factories in the United States and Canada and that the daily production—and consequent daily consumption—is about 25,000 gross. It may seem a queer statement to make that 100,000 hours of each successive day are spent by the people of the two countries in striking a light, but such is undoubtedly the case. In each gross of matches manufactured there are 144 boxes, so that the 25,000 gross produces 3,600,000 boxes. Each box, at least those made in the States where a duty of one cent upon every box of matches is levied—contains 100 matches, so that the number of matches produced and used daily amounts to 360,000,000. Counting that it takes a second to light each match—and it is questionable whether it can be done in less time than that, while some men occupy several minutes sometimes in trying to strike a light, particularly when boozy—to light the 360,000,000 would take just that number of seconds. This gives 6,000,000 minutes, or 100,000 hours. In days of twenty-four hours each it figures up to 4,166⅔, and gives eleven years and five months, with a couple of days extra, as the time occupied during every twenty-four hours, by the people of North America—not figuring on the Mexicans—in striking matches. Figuring a little further it gives 4,159 years time in each year. The fact may seem amazing, but it is undoubtedly correct. —Ottawa Free Press.

Lake Tahoe.

The Tahoe Tattler says that there are a great many erroneous ideas extant relative to this lake and announces that it will make it a special part of its business to correct them and give the real facts concerning it regarding climatology, geology, boating, etc. It is situated 6,220 feet above the sea, is twenty-two miles long from north to south and twelve and one-half miles wide, the general contour being a parallelogram. The greatest measured depth that we have good authority for is 1,506 feet. The the temperature never goes below 39 deg. Fahrenheit and in the summer never above 60, unless it be near the shore in some sheltered cove or where a stream of sun-warmed water runs into it. At a depth of 500 feet the temperature never changes, being 39½ deg. This fact accounts for another—that of drowned persons never rising—the water being so cold that no gases are generated, hence the body in time simply goes to pieces from the action of the water. It is as buoyant as any other pure water at the same altitude, there being no appreciable difference in the readings of the hydrometer, hence the statement that wood does not float for any time, persons cannot swim and the like, are fallacies. The air being very light at this elevation above the level of the sea, exercise of any kind, either on land or water, cannot be so long continued as in lower and heavier atmospheres.

Arctic Animals.

Among animals, the Polar bear, pure white in winter, is found on the sea coast and in slightly-wooded regions, but the variety is not abundant. The small white rabbit, same as seen in the Middle States, except in color, frequents wooded regions along river courses and is abundant. Reindeer were formerly abundant on the sea coast and traveled in immense herds, but since the introduction of firearms these animals have been destroyed in some localities and driven from others, and now they are found only in restricted localities. A few years ago they existed in vast numbers on Nuneyak island, and the Indians were in the habit of slaughtering them with senseless improvidence. They were once so plenty and tame there that they could be shot in numbers from the huts of the natives. One traveler says that he saw over 4,000 fawn skins hanging up to dry in a single village. Poison is sometimes used in taking game—an execrable practice. In the open throughout the interior country reindeer are still found in small bands.

Moose are still found along the rivers in the Yukon territory and in wooded places. Their skins are used for clothing; they are thick, stiff and heavy before being tanned, but are rendered soft and pliable under the manipulation of the Indian tanners, who use the animal's brains in the operation.

The Polar bear is found on the northern coast of Alaska. This huge animal formerly ranged as far south as the mouth of the Yukon; and tradition has it that one was once seen on St. Paul's island in latitude 57 deg. north, supposed to have been carried there on a floating ice field. In the Coast mountains range cinnamon, black and grizzly bears; but none of these varieties are common here.

Back from the coast bears are more numerous, especially the black on the Upper Yukon, were many skins are annually taken. I gathered a good deal of interesting gossip about the manner of capturing the bear. The natives give the red bear, and especially the grizzly, a wide berth. One white hunter reported seeing a band of fifteen black bears on Peace river, in the Hudson bay country, feeding on berries on a hillside, and six in one place on the Yukon, the present spring. The grizzly is not frequently found, for the sufficient reason, I suppose, that he is rarely "lost." The barren ground bear, a smaller animal, dull yellowish brown in color, inhabits a wide, treeless region extending from the western part of British America to Alaska.—*Alaska Cor. A Business Woman.

A business looking woman bounced upon the rear platform, strode through the car at a go-as-you-please gait and exclaimed:

"Now, driver! don't you start this car until I find out something."

"Well, ma'am, what is it?"

"Will this car take me to St. Aubin avenue?"

"Yes ma'am."

"Then you just drive ahead, for I'm in a hurry. Do you know Sam Smith?"

"No, ma'am."

"Why, you ought to. He came here from York State three years ago, and he rides up and down on these street cars night and day. He lives in a big two-story white house on the right or left hand side, I've forgotten which, with green window blinds and a porchico in front. I'll know the place when I see it, for Samanthy writ me all about it."

"I beg your pardon ma'am," said the driver interrupting, "but you haven't put your fare in the box."

"No, nor I ain't agoin' to nuther, until you stop in front of Samanthy Smith's house."

"But I don't go up St. Aubin avenue, ma'am. I'll leave you at the corner, and you'll have to walk up to the house."

"Well, you'll not get my nickel until you drive right up in front of the house. You can't play any of your swindling city games on me, young man, you bet! I haven't come clear here from York State to cut my eye teeth, nor you can't play no tricks on me if you do drive a hoss car."

She was finally induced to pay her fare, some of the passengers assuring her that it was all right. As the car stopped and she stepped from the footboard she pointed up St Aubin avenue with her parasol and exclaimed: "There's the house where Sam and Samanthy live. I knew I'd know it as quick as ever I saw it. Two-story white house with green winder blinds onto it and a porchico in front," and the car drove on.—Detroit Free Press.

With wonderous care,
She seeks the mirror,
And bangs her hair.
After the marriage,
With angry glare,
She grabs her slipper,
And bangs her hair.

Not long ago, in a French provincial theater, a baritone made a fearful croak. Hisses and laughter in the audience. Then the artist came gravely forward and saluted the audience: "Messieurs, I discover that I have issued a false note; I withdraw it from circulation."

A bright little girl was sent to get some eggs, and on her way back stumbled and fell, making sad havoc with the contents of her basket. "Won't you catch it when you get home, though!" exclaimed her companion. "No, indeed, I won't," she answered; "I've got a grandmother."

The East Indian Prince of Gondal is on the eve of matrimony. He is to lead seven happy maidens to the altar all at once. The troubled life of an East Indian Prince has its compensations. Just think of it! Eight souls with but a single thought, eight hearts that beat as one!—Boston Transcript.

"My gracious, child," said the old lady to a boy who offered to carry her sachel for 5 cents, "where did you get those hands from?" The lad gazed thoughtfully for a moment at his pair of flippers, that looked like bunches of young onions, and then answered proudly: "I belong to the Tontine Base-Ball Club."

"I'd laugh if I should fall and break my neck," jestingly remarked James Maloney, of Tappan, N. Y., while in the act of descending from a fall pear tree. The next moment he lay upon the ground with his neck broken. But he didn't laugh. What infernal liars some men are.

In order to cure her husband of drinking, a colored woman in South Carolina put concentrated lye in his whisky bottle. The last words he uttered were to the effect that it would be a relief to him to drop into Hades to cool off, and the last words the widow spoke to the outside world as she dodged into jail were: "I nevah seed sich weak stomachs as de niggahs are gettin' nowadays; dey can't stand nuffin!"

The Dynamite Piano.

Several musical composers have turned their attention of late to Eastern tragedies. The Musical Herald gives a short musical story in ridicule of the new style. After representing rival lovers in the usual way, the story concludes:

"Ha!" interrupted the tenor, "he always plays the same thing and always without notes. I doubt he can play anything at sight."

"I can play any composition at sight, even with one eye closed," responded the proud pianist.

"It is well," sneered the tenor. "I have here with me a new composition of my own, a Nihilistic symphony in several movements. You will observe that it begins pppp and continues very softly until this chord (a diminished seventeenth), which is to be struck ffff. Do you think you can give the sudden climax?"

"I have force enough for two more f's if you wish them," calmly replied the pianist, as he sat down before the instrument. He began very softly, so softly that one might have heard a pin drop. Minka sat beside him in ecstasy, although very little of the sound was audible. The fatal diminished seventeenth chord approached. It came. Swooping his arms wildly in the air, he let them crash upon the piano—bang!

The fragments of the two lovers spread over three counties. The tenor, who had fled, had smeared dynamite upon the keys, and achieved his revenge. He was never heard of any more. By order of the benevolent Czar, the remains were carefully swept up, but, as they could not be assorted with certainty, they were buried in one grave, where they still remain, a fearful testimony of the singer's revenge.

SCRAPS OF SCIENCE.

A MANUSCRIPT treatise by Copernicus has been discovered in the Stockholm Observatory.

CERTAIN species of animals have regular cemeteries to which they repair to die. The South American llama, for instance, has its district cemeteries in which bones are found in great numbers.

IN EXPERIMENTS to determine the depth beneath the surface of the sea to which sight could penetrate, twenty-five fathoms was found to be the limit of visibility. It was also found that the water is most transparent when its temperature is highest.

AN EXTRAORDINARY interest is manifested in the Polar regions this year, two expeditions being now en route to that locality from the United States, one each from Norway and Sweden and Denmark, a private one from England, and an official one from France.

IT IS probable that very soon the southern part of the Territory of Utah will supply enough of antimony for this country, and render unnecessary any importation of that substance. The ore mined about one hundred and forty miles from Salt Lake City yields from 60 to 65 per cent. of antimony.

THE Rev. Dr. McCook has noticed a black "carpenter ant," which is capable of effecting great destruction in woodwork, contrary to the general belief that ants outside of the tropics are harmless practically. He has seen a rafter in which this species, the Formica Bennsylvanica, had penetrated to an extent of five or six feet of its length, completely honeycombing it. It is evident that such penetration of wooden structures, and especially bridges, might cause their disastrous and unexpected fall.

ONE of the most decided impressions which non-scientific people must receive from the visit of the great comet of 1881 is that of the ignorance of science concerning these mysterious visitants. Whence they come or whither they go are problems none can solve; while the unfulfilled predictions of the return of certain comets show that calculations in relation to the motions of these bodies partake much of the nature of guesses. With all the skill and telescopic penetration of our astronomers, they can not yet trace the course of the comet, which in a few days passes across the immeasurable expanse of space viewed from this earth, and disappears in the depths beyond, to wander perhaps for thousands of years before completing the cycle of its journey, and returning to a point in its orbit near the earth.

Two or the foremost chemists of St. Petersburg, Messrs. Beitstein and Kurbatow, have subjected the Caucasian petroleum to a critical examination, which has been published in full in the proceedings of the German Chemical Society. The peculiarity of this petroleum consists of its high specific gravity as compared with American petroleum of the same boiling point. For a long time this fact caused the consumers to be mistrustful of their own oil. Experiments and comparisons, however, proved that the Russian oil gave 10 per cent. more light than the American, and it was also found that the illuminating oil even of this high gravity was drawn up the wick to the flame more easily than the American oil. The high gravity of Caucasian oils has for some time been taken advantage of by the manufacturers of lubricating oils.

How Men Become Insane.

A large number of lunatics in our asylums are the victims of their own misconduct. Almost any person can make himself a lunatic if he pursues the direct method. There are hundreds and perhaps thousands in this city driving themselves to madness. Gambling, speculation and hard drinking will undermine the strongest intellects. A young man of my acquaintance has lately been sent to Bloomingdale Asylum who was, a few years ago, so promising as to obtain an important appointment. He abused his position, wasted a large salary, became suddenly a gambler and a rake as well as a defaulter.

The same idea is advanced by Hogarth, who finishes the "Rake's Progress" by the scene in the mad-house. During the last five years large numbers have been carried to the asylum, the victims of speculation. The love of pleasure and the haste to get rich have done a fearful work. After the intellect has been over-driven it must sink and perhaps remain in hopeless prostration." It may be added that the increase of insanity since the opening of the present year is of unparalleled degree. More than 500 cases have been reported during this brief interval, and hence it is not surprising that the asylums are more than full. The attention of the public has been called to this subject by the press, and additional room must be provided. We must either abate that furious intemperance which is driving so many to madness, or we must double our asylums all through the State.—Troy Times.

Washington Red Tape.

There is annually issued by the departments at Washington about 300 miles of red tape. If this were stretched out in a straight line it would reach from Washington to New Haven, Ct., on the north, or from Washington to Wilmington, N. C., on the south. Using Washington as a pivotal point, and moving the tape around, the ends would touch the great lakes and pass through the States of Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Kentucky, Tennessee and North Carolina. Or, to make another illustration, from the Interior Department to the Navy Department is about one-half a mile. The tape would go around these departments 300 times, and bind them closer and more securely than ever Indian and tar were bound before. To go into details: The Treasury Department alone requires 288,000 yards of red tape, and is closely followed by the Interior Department with 129,600 yards. Following come the Navy, with 49,500 yards; the State, with 28,800 yards; the War, with 14,400 yards, and last, the Postoffice with 12,900 yards.—Washington Post.

The French Republic.

France is the most prosperous country of Europe. Its agricultural industries are large and the people are industrious and economical. The debt is owned at home and the people don't want it paid, because they believe more firmly in their own Government than in outside powers. The French republic will be permanent. The death of the Prince Imperial was a great blow to the Bonapartist faction, but the three monarchical parties together are not formidable against the republic. The Republican party can hardly be defeated unless by serious divisions among the leaders, which are not to be feared. The days of coup d'etats in France are past. There have been no serious disturbances of late years. The Government is strong and conservative.—Ex-Minister Noyce.

Brother Gardner on Smypathy.

"Am dis a sympathetic kentry, or am we a race of inconsistents?" asked the old man as he slowly unfolded his legs and stood erect. "As soon as a murderer am sentenced to be hung a sheer of de public begin to weep an' snuffle an' wipe deir eyes an' petishun fur his pardon, entirely forgittin' de widder an' chillen of de victim. What do you call dat? Grant had two terms, a big salary an' a good show, an' while 10,000 orfuns in America wanted bread 'public sympathy' raised a quarter of a millyon of dollars fur a man already rollin' in wealth? What do you call dat? A general who neber won a battle am presented wid $2,000 worf of silver-war' frew public sympathy, while 20,000 private sojers, maimed and wounded fur life, have to fight de hull kentry fur a paltry penshun? What do you call dat? A good husband an' a kind father am killed ebery hour in de day in dis kentry, an' a man would have a hard day's work to collect a fund of two dollars to help bury him. If Vanderbilt or Gould war' to be smashed up to-morrow somebody would suggest a testimonial of a millyon dollars. If twenty honest but poor man war' smashed up nex' day it would be nip an' tuck to raise a fund large 'nuff to pay for de coffins. We am fust horrified at a murder, an' den turn aroun' an' weep ober de murderer. We sen' men to prison to punish 'em, an' de judge an' jury turn aroun' an' sign a petishun for pardon. We make laws one day an' seek to upset 'em de nex'. De man wid commits a great crime today am spoken of as a fren' tomorrer. Arter sleepin' on it one night we call him a lunatic an' fin' excuses for him. Public sympathy has abolished the gallus' an' yet it will suffer woman and children to starve an' freeze to death. Men rob our banks an' am pursued, not to be punished, but to be given a commision on deir stealings. Public sympathy, as I see it, am a sort o' jar filled wid buttermilk, bones, hash, buttons, scrap-iron, beer-slops an' wilted bouquets. I doan' want any of it. If I break de law I want de penalty enforced. If I meet wid misfortune I want to borry instead of beg. If I die I want no eulogies on my varchues or criticisms on my failins."—Free Press.

Sleep and Cleanliness of Ants.

It is probable that all ants enjoy periods of true slumber alternating with those of activity; but actual observations on this subject have only been made in the case of two or three species. Dr. McCook says that the harvesting ants of Texas sleep so soundly that they may be pretty severely stroked with a feather without being aroused; but they are immediately awakened by a sharp tap. On awakening they often stretch their limbs in a manner precisely resembling that of warm-blooded animals, and even yawn—the latter act being "very like that of the human animal; the mandibles are thrown open with the peculiar muscular strain which is familiar to all readers; the tongue is also some times thrust out." The ordinary duration of sleep in this species is about three hours. Invariably on awakening, and often at other times, the ants perform, like many other insects, elaborate processes of washing and brushing. But, unlike other insects, ants assist one another in the performance of their toilet.

The author just quoted describes the whole process in the genus Atta. The cleanser begins with washing the face of her companion, then passing on to the thorax, legs and abdomen. The attitude of the cleansed all this while is one of intense satisfaction, quite resembling that of a family dog when one is scratching the back of his neck. The insect stretches out her limbs, and as her friend takes them successively into hand, yields them limp and supple to her manipulation; she rolls gently over on her side, even quite over on her back, and with all her limbs relaxed presents a perfect picture of muscular surrender and ease. The pleasure which the creatures take in being thus "combed" and "sponged" is really enjoyable to the observer. I have seen an ant kneel down before another and thrust forward the head drooping quite under the face, and lie there motionless, thus expressing, as plainly as sign language could, her desire to be cleansed. I at once understood the gesture, and so did the supplicated ant, for she at once went to work.—Nineteenth Century.

A Safety-Valve.

On almost all boilers connected with engines there can be found a safety-valve (as it is called). Whenever the boiler gets too full of steam and is in danger of bursting, this little valve opens and lets the steam out. No one has to watch it, for it opens of itself. There was once a man who wanted to travel on a certain steamboat. He went to the boat and examined the machinery, but he found that there was not a safety-valve on the boiler; so he said to the Captain, "I guess I won't go on your boat, Captain. You haven't a safety-valve, and I am afraid the boat may be blown up without it."

"Come down with me to the engine-room," said the Captain, "and I will show you the best safety-valve in the world."

When they reached the engine room the Captain went up to the engineer, and, laying his hand on his shoulder, said: "There, sir, is my safety-valve, the best to be found anywhere—a man who never drinks anything but cold water."

"You are right, captain; I want no better safety-valve than that. I will go on this boat." He knew that the engineer would always watch the machinery, and if anything went wrong he would know it instantly. Only a sober man could be trusted in the responsible position, and when the boat did have such a man it had the best safety-valve in the world.—Good Words.

CATTLE FARMING.

Progress Made in Breeding, and a Cheerful Lookout for the Future.

[Buenos Ayres Standard.]

Few can form an idea of the great increase in cattle breeding during the last two years. Estancias are silently spreading out on all sides, especially in the south, where a wave of progress has been wafted by scores of capitalists, who now view the country more from a prolific yield of animals than the quotations on the Bolsa. Few years will pass when the rodeos will stretch to the banks of the Rio Negro and to the foot of the Andes; the cattle of the province will be driven along the roads paved with the bones of animals over which the Indians used to drive Chili troops of fat "novillos." In this profitable traffic the animals succumbed on the road, and their paleontological remains testify to the magnitude of the depredations on our frontier estancias. Times have changed and soon bona fide herds will graze in peace as they silently tread on their aboriginal ancestors, whose bones eloquently point to the aboriginal state of affairs in the Province of Buenos Ayres.

The prices at present paid for cattle are unprecedented, and many wonder at their ready acceptance, leaving out of account that cattle are cheap at $300 and $400, when they can stock camps at $75,000 per league. The Buenos Ayres market has seen the last of what was formerly considered cheap cattle, and soon the cheap prices for lands will follow in the weke, and we will look back with wonder at the rates on the Rio Negro loan principal. Everything in the country is growing, and above all the cattle business, as can be proven by a few figures.

The best barometer of the increasing importance of cattle farming consists in the value of blooded stock sold for breeding purposes. If we look back as late as 1876 the reader will not fail to see that breeding was in its infancy, and only in the hands of a few who could risk and afford to lose several thousand head of cattle by Indian depredations and epidemics, arising from overstocked camps. At that period, nevertheless, the business yielded great profits, but it was mainly in the hands of wealthy capitalists. The Rio Negro expedition and the final disappearance of the Indians allowed small capitalists to enter the field, and we witness the first great stride toward the development and improvement of cattle breeding. The increase in the business during 1880 has been still more important than that which ensued in 1878, as the expedition was successfully carried out. The increase of 1880 is superior to that of every other year previous, in spite of the revolution and its consequences. We may look to still more important improvement at the end of 1881, and we hope that by that time the new office of statistics will be duly installed, and will publish the necessary figures.

The Hammock.

When children only are to use the hammock, the manner of hanging it is not very important, but if provided for the use of grown persons it should be so suspended that the head will always be considered higher than the feet, and much of the comfort of one who uses it depends upon a proper observance of this fact. If you have no more suitable place, suspend it from the columns of a veranda. The hook which supports the head end should be six and one-fourth feet from the floor, that at foot end three and three-fourths feet; and these proportions should be observed wherever it may be hung, to secure the most desirable curve for the ease of the occupant. Another point to be observed: The head should be fastened to the hook by a rope less than a foot long—just enough to attach it—while at the foot the rope should be four and a half feet long. This gives the greatest freedom for swinging the lower part of the body, while the head moves but little. This is a point which cannot be observed in a hammock for children, who think more of it as a swing than a place for comfortable repose. When trees serve for supports, ample provision should be made to prevent inury to the bark by means of stout canvas or heavy bagging between the ropes to which it is suspended and the bark. If the hanging be so arranged that the hammock can be taken in during long storms, it will last much longer.

The Assessor's Alternative.

An Irish lady called on a Brooklyn Assessor to talk with him regarding taxes. She had heretofore, by keeping a flock of geese and pasturing them upon the public commons, been able to clear from the sale of their eggs and feathers money enough in the course of a year to pay her taxes. The enforcement of the goose ordinance would compel her to sell the geese.

"An' now, Mr. Connitt," says she, "phat is it Iam to do? Ye've taken away me geese an' I can't pay me taxes. It's a sorry fix I'm in, so it is. I'll tell ye, sorr, phat I'll do. You take the geese an' I kape the taxes, or I'll kape the geese an' you take the taxes. The bargain is fair, so it is. Is it agreed ye are?"

Forbidden Fruit.

A child always covets that which is forbidden him; and yet the discipline of certain households consists, for the most part, in the enactment and enforcement of prohibitory laws. "Touch not, taste not, handle not," is inscribed upon almost everything which the child is likely to hanker after. All the trees in the garden are full of forbidden fruit. He is told that he must not take anything without asking; and he is well aware that asking will be in vain. Now, if you want to bring up your children so that they may become something, you must leave something to their own discretion. The moral judgment needs to be disciplined as well as the moral sense.

Aaron Burr as a Borrower.

It was in the summer of 1812, when a member of the class of 1815 in Harvard College on a visit to Boston of a Saturday, that I was called upon by a Mr. Fessenden and intrusted with a letter addressed to my father, reported to have been received from Aaron Burr, landed in Boston that morning after a four years' residence in Europe, which letter requiring an immediate answer I delivered the same afternoon to my father at his country seat in Brookline. My father, opening and handing it to me to read, seriously enjoined upon me no consideration whatever to mention the reception of it to my elder brother or any one in the family or out of it, which I have never done to the present day—sixty-nine years—with one exception, hereafter recorded.

The letter contained a request of Aaron Burr for a private interview, with a loan of money on a pledge of some boxes of books. My father's answer, which he likewise handed me to read, declined the interview, also the pledge of books, inclosing for him $100 in bills of the Massachusetts bank, which was all that was necessary to carry him to his New York friends, expressing his surprise at the application to one known to have been the friend of Hamilton.

Some years after arriving from Europe with my wife, at her mother's on the Hudson, I was told by some officious friend that a Mr. Davis, a friend of Aaron Burr, had spoken disparagingly of my father for not allowing Burr an interview, Burr probably never mentioning any pecuniary assistance. I gave no credit to this report, and never heard of it again. A short time after returning to Boston I communicated to a highly esteemed and respected friend, the late President Josiah Quincy, the above incident of my life, Mr. Quincey advising no further notice of it, coming from such a source.—Boston Advertiser.

GENTLEMEN:—I was suffering from general debility to such an extent that my labor was exceedingly burdensome to me. A vacation of a month did not give me much relief, but on the contrary, was followed by increased prostration and sinking chills. At this time I began the use of your IRON TONIC, from which I realized almost immediate and wonderful results. The old energy returned and I found that my natural force was not permanently abated. I have used three bottles of the Tonic. Since using it I have done twice the labor that I ever did in the same time during my illness, and with double the ease. With the tranquil nerve and vigor of body, has come also a clearness of thought never before enjoyed. If the Tonic has not done the work, I know not what. I give it the credit. J. P. WATSON, Pastor Christian Church, Troy, O.

THE president, at latest accounts, was slowly improving. He sat in a reclining chair about half an hour Tuesday.

ANOTHER bold train robbery was perpetrated last Wednesday night on the Chicago and Alton road, at Blue Cut, near Glendale, Mo., and not more than two miles from the scene of the great train robbery of Oct. 8, 1879. It is believed to be done by a gang of men living near the place, and [illegible] as some have thought by the noted James brothers. The following account of the affair is by the engineer of the train: "Between three and four miles east of Independence is a deep cut,over which the Missouri Pacific track crosses the Chicago and Alton, and it was just before entering the deepest part of this cut that I saw a pile of stones, probably five feet high, on the top of which was a stick to which was attached a red flag, and behind the whole stood the leader of the robbers. Of course I stopped. I was then approached by four of the gang, besides the leader, who said: 'Step down off that engine, and do as I tell you, or I will kill you.' He then told me to get the coal pick, which I did after some parleying, but as a revolver was pointed at my head I couldn't refuse to obey. They then marched me and John Steading, the fireman, to the express car, and told me to break the door down, which I did. Messenger Fox had hidden in the weeds by the roadside, but they swore they would kill me if he didn't come out, and so I called for him, and he entered the car with two of the robbers, who forced him to open the safe and pour the contents into a sack. They were disappointed at not getting more booty, and knocked Fox down twice with the butt of a navy revolver, cutting his head in a fearful manner. They then marched us to the coaches, where they kept us covered with their revolvers while they robbed the passengers. After the last car was gone through, they marched us back to the engine, when the leader said, 'Now get back there; we will remove the stones. You have been a bully boy, and here is a little present for you, and he handed me two silver dollars. I told them I would remove the obstructions, and the entire gang skipped up over the embankment, and were out of sight in a twinkling. In going through the passengers each one was made to hold up his hands, and what was taken from them was put into a two-bushel sack, which was nearly full of watches, money and other valuables. They didn't take anything from me,'

Frank Lombard, the news agent of the train, made the following statement: 'I was sitting in the smoking-car talking with Conductor Jack Hazelbaker. We were on the up grade, four miles from Independence. All of a sudden the train came to a stop; we heard loud voices and pistol-shots and saw lanterns flashing; we knew the train robbers were on us; Hazelbaker ran back into the train and warned the passengers; they were all looking out of the windows, till the robbers ordered them to pull in their heads and keep quiet. The robbers had stopped the train by putting an obstruction on the rails and signaling; I am sure there were a dozen of them, although some of the passengers place the number at sixteen. Everybody was panic-stricken and helpless. I ran out of the car, and found men guarding the engineer and fireman. They were poorly masked, but were all armed with Henry rifles. They were swearing loudly, and shooting at random. Some of them passed into the mail-car, but didn't touch anything. Express Messenger Fox in the mean time had barricaded the express-car. They climbed upon the run-around and began to shoot. They then broke into the car and knocked Fox down by a violent blow on the head. They robbed the safe of everything. I ran back into the smoking-car and hid most of my money. The robbers came in and ordered me to lie down. I did so. They shoved a gun to my head, and told me to fork over. I said my money was under the cushion. They told me to get it, and I got it in a hurry, you can bet. They then went back to the other cars and made a wholesale robbery of money, watches and jewelry. Some of the passengers secreted their money, but a great majority lost all. The ladies were compelled to sit down on the floor, and some had their ear-rings taken from their ears, and many lost all their jewelry. One man lost $450. In the mean time a freight train was coming up behind us, and Burton, the brakeman, ran down the cut with a storm of bullets after him, stopped the train, and probably saved many lives. After the cars were gone through, the robbers jumped off and struck for the timber, where their horses were. The men in front helped the train men roll off the obstruction, and then joined their companions. I should say we stood still half an hour.'

Brakeman Burton said: 'The freight was just behind us, and I heard it coming up. I jumped off and ran with my lantern down the track. They commenced shooting at me. The bullets whistled all around me and struck the rails and stones. They must have fired twenty-five shots. The engineer said: "For God's sake don't shoot the boy; he is saving the lives of the people!" Then one of them threw up his arms and cried: 'Stop shooting!' I rolled into the cut and waved my lantern. The train was stopped only a car length off. When I came back the robbers said: 'Have you lost anything?' I answered, 'fifty cents.' He gave me $1.50 for interest. Then I heard one of the robbers say to the engineer: 'Choppy Foote, you're too good a man to keep up this business, here's $3 to buy a drink in the morning, and drink it for Jesse James. I warn you you'll be killed if you don't leave this road. We are going to tear up and burst the Alton and Rock Island Roads, for they have been offering rewards for us. We've no grudge against the Pullmans, and we will switch off their cars and burn all the rest. I am the man who killed Westlake at Winston. He was too smart, and drew a revolver.'

Burton did not believe it was Jesse James or any of his gang. They all acted green at the business, and he thought they were men living in the vicinity. They all seem quite young,and made no attempt to disguise their voices. The passengers tell substantially the same story as the above.

THE gold mines of Georgia are again coming prominently before the public. Many years ago, they were worked, but in a very imperfect and careless way. The discoveries of gold in California drew public attention to that quarter, and in the excitement of working those wonderful mines, the mines of Georgia were abandoned, and almost forgotten. Then, too, the war had the effect to keep the attention of miners and others away from the Georgia gold fields. But now that the industries of the south are once more awakening, people are beginning to prospect in the old mines for the precious metal once more. Capitalists have begun to give the subject their attention. New machinery is taking the place of the old system of hand labor. The mud at the bottom of the Chestatee and Chattahoochee rivers, is being dredged up and washed, and yields a sufficient amount of gold dust to make it a very profitable investment. Many believe there are still better deposits in the hills in which these streams have their source.

—Ever since the Butler reunion, Weamer, of the Record, has been in a delicate condition. No amount of petting from the few who saw brilliant military genius in his conduct of the sham battle, seems to be able to compensate for the nearly unanimous ridicule it received. Like a caged animal poked with a hot rod, he snarls at everybody. Last week he called the Edgerton Herald a "dispepsd runt," and followed this with expressions and allusions too disgusting to reproduce. His remarks about the COURIER are no no less charactistic of the man's mental caliber. If he thinks to compel us to fall in love with his attenuated little sham battle by flinging at us or our employes such classic terms as "drunken louse, "low blackguard" or "notorious liar," he will make another failure. And then it don't look well for great moral reformers to get mad and talk that way.

—Mr. C. D. Hildebrand, the reformed man, will give a free lecture on "Prison Life" next Friday, Saturday and Sunday evenings, at Ensley's hall. Mr. Hildebrand has acquired quite a reputation for his life-like delineations of prison scenes and prison usage. He has been incarcerated in twenty differents prisons in different parts of the world, and, of course, understands his subject. His lecture is illustrated by paintings. The lecture Friday night will be free.

—The Press speaks of a contemporary that claims to have the most local reading. That means us, of course. But just why Brother B. should complain of our failure to publish the same item he did and on the same day, passes our understanding. Our note was published August 25, and that in the Press September 1. We can't see that it would have helped the matter, if the COURIER had waited a week until the Press got ready.

THERE was a fatal accident on the B. & O. road last week, in West Virginia. ENSLEY & HARTER.

—On Friday evening of last week, L. Hartel came to town and proceeded at once to get drunk. About supper time he encountered Billy Little, who, by-the-way, had also "histed in some steam," and the meeting ended by Billy smashing his proboscis for him. A warrant was procured and Billy was arrested. On Saturday the case came up for trial before Justice Ober and a jury of twelve good and lawful men. A trial was had and the jury retired, in charge of Constable Porter. One man on the jury thought that Billy was guilty, but the other eleven were contrary, and said he was not guilty. Ballot after ballot was had, but still the eleven voted not guilty. About this time the constable got hungry, and, leaving the key in the door of their room, started in pursuit of something to eat. After he had gone, a boy outside was requested to turn the key for them, which he did. The jury was now master of the situation, and when one got hungry he would go and eat; if he wanted his mail he would go after it; if he wanted a "snifter" he would go and get one, etc.; but it was necessary that the jury agree. So some of the balky eleven practiced a little politics on the man who disagreed, by slipping out his ticket of "guilty" and slipping a "not guilty" one in its place. When the votes were counted out, behold the twelve men appeared to have been of one mind, and the foreman was about to proceed to sign a verdict of "not guilty," when a juror objected, and said: "By thunder there was some 'hocus pocus' about that thing." And he accused the foreman of stealing his ballot out of the hat. The foreman knew nothing about the trick that had been played, and, of course, "got his back up," and insisted that the matter was all right, so far as he knew. Some loud talk was engaged in, and two of the jurors came near fighting. Finally the court was sent for, and the jury was all in except four—these were soon hunted up and all were discharged, and Billy was permitted to go hence without day.

—On the first page of this paper, is an article giving a description of how Mr. Dalrymple runs his large farm. It is hardly in accordance with the facts to call it a farm, as we judge by reading the article that it must make a very large township. More men are employed than at any one enterprise in our Hoosier state; and he has more self-binding reapers on this farm than all the agricultural men in this county have in stock. It should be read by every subscriber of the COURIER.

—One night last week, Erve Scott heard a noise on the stair-way leading to his sleeping apartment, and after asking several times, "Is that you, Tom?" and receiving no reply, he slipped a nail over the door latch so as not to give entrance into the room. About half-past ten, Tom came home and occupied his bed in the lower room. Just as he was dozing off, with little angels hovering o'er his brow, he heard some one coming down stairs, and thinking it was Erve, paid no attention to the matter, and not until the next morning did either of them know any better. It was probably a tramp.

—Wm. Groscop was taken before the squire and fined $10 last Monday, for selling liquor to parties who were intoxicated. The deputy prosecutor is making huge efforts to get his share of the laborer's wages.

—Wm. Snyder, of our town, had a serious accident about four miles on this side of Ft. Wayne, on Tuesday evening of this week, by some parties running horses, and coming up in the rear, tipped his buggy over and threw out the occupants, bruising up himself and wife considerably.

—We are sorry that our people do not take more interest in a good show performance. Dr. Arnold, who was billed to show at Ensley's hall one night last week, did not have a dozen in the audience. We have been told that he gives a most pleasing performance, and upon the second night at Angola he had a sixty dollar house.

—The Record says: "Butler has several times the advantage of railroad competition over the other towns of the county." We are always glad to hear of the prosperity of Butler, but will submit the following facts: Butler has two railroads, Waterloo two and Auburn three. Now, the new arithmetic, by Wesmer, must contain the following three proportions:

(a) 2 equals 2.
(b) 2 is several times greater than 2.
(c) 2 is several times greater than 3.

—We acknowledge with thanks the receipt of a pass to the Steuben county fair, to be held at Angola, Indiana, October 11, 12, 13 and 14. The Steuben county fair has always been under good management, and parties attending the fair may rest assured that they will be shown every courtesy to which they are entitled, by the officers of the association and the citizens of Angola generally. For premium lists, etc., address,

—The Lynchburg Virginian describes an ingenious trap devised by a Virginia farmer to capture sheep-killing dogs. Having suffered severely from the depredations of dogs upon his sheep fold, he built around a number of sheep that dogs had killed, an inclosure of rails twelve feet high and about ten feet square at the ground, the sides of the trap sloping inward until an opening was left about five feet square. Any dog could easily climb such a sloping fence and enter the pen, but not even a grey-hound could jump out of it. In three nights the farmer captured forty-six dogs, including fifteen or twenty, that had never been seen before in that neighborhood.

—Now, as the school days have come, and the young, as well as the old, read the COURIER, we will publish an old story for the benefit of the little fellows who have not had the experience in the world that we have.

We once knew a little boy who would not go to school. He monkeyed around town peddling bills for the shows, ringing bells for auctions, etc., anything under the shining sun to stay out of school. Well, he didn't amount to much as a scholar, but he could swear just like a grown person, chew dog-leg tobacco and lie like a stump speaker. There was a great and good man living in the same town who had gone to school when he was young, had been corporal in the militia, assistant secretary in a church choir, wore a plug hat and wanted to go to the legislature. Among his other vast possessions he owned a mule. As he (the mule, not the man) was rather light behind, and it was dangerous within a radius of forty feet from his heels, the statesman posted a sign, reading:

"BEWAIR THE MUEL."

People who had been to school, read the sign and "bewaired," but this bad boy couldn't read it, and he walked up as brave as a lion and took a good look at the animal. The sleepy mule glanced out of the corner of his north eye, and in two seconds the bad boy went through the roof and away up among the twinkling stars, until he could look down on the shining spires of the New Jerusalem. A part of him lit over in the next county and a part of him is going yet. His grief-stricken parents couldn't gather up enough to hold an inquest over, and it all happened because this bad boy didn't go to school.

Boys, remember, and when you start for school go there, and you may be wise and great, and sometime will be president of the day on the Fourth of July, or may be a lieutenant-governor.

Bennett Captured.

Bennett, the man who shot the marshal of Montpelier, in Williams county, Ohio, and whom the officers have been after for a week past, was arrested near Metz, in Steuben county, last Saturday. He was taken by Henry Aldrich and F. B. VanAuken, who had been so long principal of the schools in Waterloo. Mr. Aldrich overtook the fellow on the road to Metz, and, believing he knew him, asked him to ride. After some hesitation, Bennett consented, and the two rode along together chatting very socially. Coming to VanAuken's place, Aldrich made an excuse to go into the house, saying he wished to see Mr. V. about getting some cattle. Bennett remained in the buggy holding the lines. The two men soon came out of the house and down to the road, apparently engaged in a cattle trade. After talking long enough to satisfy them that they had the right man, they suddenly siezed him, and after a hard struggle, disarmed and bound him. They took him to Angola, and then to Bryan, Ohio, on a requisition from the Ohio authorities. The capture was well planned, and was carried out with a skill and coolness that do the captors great credit. It will not be a bad thing financially, either, as a reward of $500 had been offered for Bennett's arrest, dead or alive.

Baltimore Oriole.

This unique festival, which takes place at Baltimore, October 10, 11 and 12, is a new feature in the way of grotesque amusements. While it resembles the Mardi Gras of Memphis and New Orleans, it is at the same time free from many of the objectionable features of the latter. Great expense and pains have been taken to make the pageant a grand one. There will be a monster parade in the day-time, a novel feature of which will be the use of huge platform cars running on the tracks of the city railways, carrying thousands of maskers through the principal streets. At night the city will be illuminated by calcium and electric lights. The B. & O. gives half fare from all its regular stations, good for ten days to all who wish to see this splendid pageant.

—The concert given this week under the management of Mr. & Mrs. J. E. Kane, was quite a nice entertainment, and largely patronized. The scenery was beautiful, while the actors acquitted themselves in a very satisfactory manner. We will give a few notes which came under the observation of a COURIER reporter:

Geo. Staley and Conny Little acted as sextons and seated the "thirty cent" part of the audience.

Cal. Houser walked up and down the isle with an overcoat on and made the audience shiver.

Dr. Allen, jr., sold the tickets and kept up a continual smile while gazing upon the shining lucre.

The hall was lighted with the brilliancy of a "pon shop," that was on its last legs.

Sam. Puff was'nt there and the merry laugh of the audience had no variations.

Jenk Eldridge was "curtain puller" but he neglected to grease himself before the show began and the curtain acted very stubbernly.

The solo sang by Mrs. Kane was well received.

Mr. Kane can not walk off in the singing line any too well.

The grand marches dryads, etc., were altogether too lengthy.

Old Settlers at the Fair.

MESSRS EDITORS: At the last old settler's meeting, the officers of the Northeastern Agricultural Association, extended an invitation to all old settlers in the county to attend one day of their fair, to be held at Waterloo, commencing Oct. 3, 1881. That the old settlers, that is, those who were residents of DeKalb county on January 1, 1840 and still are residents of DeKalb county, would be admitted free, on Oct. 4, '81, upon the certificate of the secretary of the old settler's association. Certificates are now ready to be delivered on request by me, up to and including Oct. 1, 1881. On Oct. 3 and 4, such certificates can only be had of John Butt esq., of Waterloo, who has kindly consented to act on those days as my special deputy, at his hotel during the fair, and will issue certificates to those entitled. A register of each applicant will be made, giving name, age and date of settlement in the county. Those not personally acquainted with Mr. Butt or myself when they apply for certificates, will bring some person, who will vouch for them. It is hoped that all old settlers, who can, will accept and enjoy the generous invitation extended to them by the officers of the fair. W. H. DILLS, Sec'y.

—Frank Strebe traded horses with the gypsies Monday. They changed harnesses and Frank bridled and placed the collar on his new steed. Bill Sthair slapped his right hand on his left knee and began laughing. But we digress. Frank pulled the thills on each side of the horse and—Tom. Sommers began "hollering" "Whoa, Blaze!" and Alf. Carter crawled in the bung-hole of a beer keg to hide himself. But again we digress. When the thills were in their proper place there was no harness on the horse, and some said that Frank was excited. He finally reached the Baptist church where the bell tolled. Night came on and we "got." Frank will follow horse swapping in the future, and those wishing to deal with him are hereby notified to call at his residence, at the north end of Van Buren street. THE president, at latest accounts, was slowly improving. He sat in a reclining chair about half an hour Tuesday.

ANOTHER bold train robbery was perpetrated last Wednesday night on the Chicago and Alton road, at Blue Cut, near Glendale, Mo., and not more than two miles from the scene of the great train robbery of Oct. 8, 1879. It is believed to be done by a gang of men living near the place, and not as some have thought by the noted James brothers. The following account of the affair is by the engineer of the train: "Between three and four miles east of Independence is a deep cut, over which the Missouri Pacific track crosses the Chicago and Alton, and it was just before entering the deepest part of this cut that I saw a pile of stones, probably five feet high, on the top of which was a stick to which was attached a red flag, and behind the whole stood the leader of the robbers. Of course I stopped. I was then approached by four of the gang, besides the leader, who said: 'Step down off that engine, and do as I tell you, or I will kill you.' He then told me to get the coal pick, which I did after some parleying, but as a revolver was pointed at my head I couldn't refuse to obey. They then marched me and John Steading, the fireman, to the express car, and told me to break the door down, which I did. Messenger Fox had hidden in the weeds by the roadside, but they swore they would kill me if he didn't come out, and so I called for him, and he entered the car with two of the robbers, who forced him to open the safe and pour the contents into a sack. They were disappointed at not getting more booty, and knocked Fox down twice with the butt of a navy revolver, cutting his head in a fearful manner. They then marched us to the coaches, where they kept us covered with their revolvers while they robbed the passengers. After the last car was gone through, they marched us back to the engine, when the leader said, 'Now get back there; we will remove the stones. You have been a bully boy, and here is a little present for you, and he handed me two silver dollars. I told them I would remove the obstructions, and the entire gang skipped up over the embankment, and were out of sight in a twinkling. In going through the passengers each one was made to hold up his hands, and what was taken from them was put into a two-bushel sack, which was nearly full of watches, money and other valuables. They didn't take anything from me,'

Frank Lombard, the news agent of the train, made the following statement: 'I was sitting in the smoking-car talking with Conductor Jack Hazelbaker. We were on the up grade, four miles from Independence. All of a sudden the train came to a stop; we heard loud voices and pistol-shots and saw lanterns flashing; we knew the train robbers were on us; Hazelbaker ran back into the train and warned the passengers; they were all looking out of the windows, till the robbers ordered them to pull in their heads and keep quiet. The robbers had stopped the train by putting an obstruction on the rails and signaling; I am sure there were a dozen of them, although some of the passengers place the number at sixteen. Everybody was panic-stricken and helpless. I ran out of the car, and found men guarding the engineer and fireman. They were poorly masked, but were all armed with Henry rifles. They were swearing loudly, and shooting at random. Some of them passed into the mail-car, but didn't touch anything. Express Messenger Fox in the mean time had barricaded the express-car. They climbed upon the run-around and began to shoot. They then broke into the car and knocked Fox down by a violent blow on the head. They robbed the safe of everything. I ran back into the smoking-car and hid most of my money. The robbers came in and ordered me to lie down. I did so. They shoved a gun to my head, and told me to fork over. I said my money was under the cushion. They told me to get it, and I got it in a hurry, you can bet. They then went back to the other cars and made a wholesale robbery of money, watches and jewelry. Some of the passengers secreted their money, but a great majority lost all. The ladies were compelled to sit down on the floor, and some had their ear-rings taken from their ears, and many lost all their jewelry. One man lost $450. In the mean time a freight train was coming up behind us, and Burton, the brakeman, ran down the cut with a storm of bullets after him, stopped the train, and probably saved many lives. After the cars were gone through, the robbers jumped off and struck for the timber, where their horses were. The men in front helped the train men roll off the obstruction, and then joined their companions. I should say we stood still half an hour.'

Brakeman Burton said: 'The freight was just behind us, and I heard it coming up. I jumped off and ran with my lantern down the track. They commenced shooting at me. The bullets whistled all around me and struck the rails and stones. They must have fired twenty-five shots. The engineer said: "For God's sake don't shoot the boy; he is saving the lives of the people!" Then one of them threw up his arms and cried: 'Stop shooting!' I rolled into the cut and waved my lantern. The train was stopped only a car length off. When I came back the robbers said: 'Have you lost anything?' I answered, 'fifty cents.' He gave me $1.50 for interest. Then I heard one of the robbers say to the engineer: 'Choppy Foote, you're too good a man to keep up this business, here's $3 to buy a drink in the morning, and drink it for Jesse James. I warn you you'll be killed if you don't leave this road. We are going to tear up and burst the Alton and Rock Island Roads, for they have been offering rewards for us. We've no grudge against the Pullmans, and we will switch off their cars and burn all the rest. I am the man who killed Westlake at Winston. He was too smart, and drew a revolver.'

Burton did not believe it was Jesse James or any of his gang. They all acted green at the business, and he thought they were men living in the vicinity. They all seem quite young, and made no attempt to disguise their voices. The passengers tell substantially the same story as the above.

THE gold mines of Georgia are again coming prominently before the public. Many years ago, they were worked, but in a very imperfect and careless way. The discoveries of gold in California drew public attention to that quarter, and in the excitement of working those wonderful mines, the mines of Georgia were abandoned, and almost forgotten. Then, too, the war had the effect to keep the attention of miners and others away from the Georgia gold fields. But now that the industries of the south are once more awakening, people are beginning to prospect in the old mines for the precious metal once more. Capitalists have begun to give the subject their attention. New machinery is taking the place of the old system of hand labor. The mud at the bottom of the Chestatee and Chattahoochee rivers, is being dredged up and washed, and yields a sufficient amount of gold dust to make it a very profitable investment. Many believe there are still better deposits in the hills in which these streams have their source.

—Ever since the Butler reunion, Weamer, of the Record, has been in a delicate condition. No amount of petting from the few who saw brilliant military genius in his conduct of the sham battle, seems to be able to compensate for the nearly unanimous ridicule it received. Like a caged animal poked with a hot rod, he snarls at everybody. Last week he called the Edgerton Herald a "diaperad runt," and followed this with expressions and allusions too disgusting to reproduce His remarks about the COURIER are no no less charactistic of the man's mental caliber. If he thinks to compel us to fall in love with his attenuated little sham battle by flinging at us or our employes such classic terms as "drunken louse, "low blackguard" or "notorious liar," he will make another failure. And then it don't look well for great moral reformers to get mad and talk that way.

—Mr. C. D. Hildebrand, the reformed man, will give a free lecture on "Prison Life" next Friday, Saturday and Sunday evenings, at Ensley's hall. Mr. Hildebrand has acquired quite a reputation for his life-like delineations of prison scenes and prison usage. He has been incarcerated in twenty different prisons in different parts of the world, and, of course, understands his subject. His lecture is illustrated by paintings. The lecture Friday night will be free.

—The Press speaks of a contemporary that claims to have the most local reading. That means us, of course. But just why Brother B. should complain of our failure to publish the same item he did and on the same day, passes our understanding. Our note was published August 25, and that in the Press September 1. We can't see that it would have helped the matter, if the COURIER had waited a week until the Press got ready.

The Lake Shore road runs an extra train to Toledo this week, to accommodate those who visit the Toledo fair. It passes Waterloo about half past six each morning.

J. D. McAnally is busy making his patent tug fastener. His attachments are a great improvement to harness fastenings. Those who have use for harness, ought to see them.

Mrs. Frank Kennedy, the popular dressmaker, is already nearly overrun with orders. She says, that work is coming in, unusually early, and in greater quantities than ever before.

L. A. Cato and wife have set up housekeeping for themselves, and are happy and contented. Mr. C. has abandoned the commercial business for a time, and will assist Sam Beck in the produce trade.

Mrs. O. T. Clark was out riding for a short time the other day. This is the first time she has been able to take a ride since her long illness. We hope soon to be able to congratulate her on a full recovery.

Slocum and Wirts, of Angola, had over two hundred head of cattle, partly young stock, in John Leas' field on the east side of Uniontown, the first of the week. They were awaiting shipment, and will be about five car loads. They go to Iowa.

Ike Mannheimer will take charge of the second floor in Kahn's store, and sell clothing to his numerous friends, by the piece, suit, wagon load or by the ton, just as it suits them. With that stock of goods, Ike is prepared for any one that comes.

R. M. Lockhart returned Monday. He is now very busy, not only with his lumber business, but in working up the interests of the state fair. His duties at Indianapolis will compel him to go there soon, and remain a greater part of the time, until the fair is over.

J. N. McBride went to St. Joe Tuesday, in the interest of J. A. Boozer. He is taking a lay off in the threshing business just now, as people are busy seeding, and besides wheat is nearly all threshed. After seeding is over, he will resume work, but mainly in hulling clover. He thinks clover seed will be a good crop this year.

ENSLEY & HARTER.

—On Friday evening of last week, L. Hartel came to town and proceeded at once to get drunk. About supper time he encountered Billy Little, who, by-the-way, had also "histed in some steam," and the meeting ended by Billy smashing his proboscis for him. A warrant was procured and Billy was arrested. On Saturday the case came up for trial before Justice Ober and a jury of twelve good and lawful men. A trial was had and the jury retired, in charge of Constable Porter. One man on the jury thought that Billy was guilty, but the other eleven were contrary, and said he was not guilty. Ballot after ballot was had, but still the eleven voted not guilty. About this time the constable got hungry, and, leaving the key in the door of their room, started in pursuit of something to eat. After he had gone, a boy outside was requested to turn the key for them, which he did. The jury was now master of the situation, and when one got hungry he would go and eat; if he wanted his mail he would go after it; if he wanted a "snifter" he would go and get one, etc.; but it was necessary that the jury agree. So some of the balky eleven practiced a little politics on the man who disagreed, by slipping out his ticket of "guilty" and slipping a "not guilty" one in its place. When the votes were counted out, behold the twelve men appeared to have been of one mind, and the foreman was about to proceed to sign a verdict of "not guilty," when a juror objected, and said: "By thunder there was some 'hocus pocus' about that thing." And he accused the foreman of stealing his ballot out of the hat. The foreman knew nothing about the trick that had been played, and, of course, "got his back up," and insisted that the matter was all right, so far as he knew. Some loud talk was engaged in, and two of the jurors came near fighting. Finally the court was sent for, and the jury was all in except four—these were soon hunted up and all were discharged, and Billy was permitted to go hence without day.

—On the first page of this paper, is an article giving a description of how Mr. Dalrymple runs his large farm. It is hardly in accordance with the facts to call it a farm, as we judge by reading the article that it must make a very large township. More men are employed than at any one enterprise in our Hoosier state; and he has more self-binding reapers on this farm than all the agricultural men in this county have in stock. It should be read by every subscriber of the COURIER.

—One night last week, Erve Scott heard a noise on the stair-way leading to his sleeping apartment, and after asking several times, "Is that you, Tom?" and receiving no reply, he slipped a nail over the door latch so as not to give entrance into the room. About half-past ten, Tom came home and occupied his bed in the lower room. Just as he was dozing off, with little angels hovering o'er his brow, he heard some one coming down stairs, and thinking it was Erve, paid no attention to the matter, and not until the next morning did either of them know any better. It was probably a tramp.

—Wm. Groscop was taken before the squire and fined $10 last Monday, for selling liquor to parties who were intoxicated. The deputy prosecutor is making huge efforts to get his share of the laborer's wages.

—The Record says: "Butler has several times the advantage of railroad competition over the other towns of the county." We are always glad to hear of the prosperity of Butler, but will submit the following facts: Butler has two railroads, Waterloo two and Auburn three. Now, the new arithmetic, by Weamer, must contain the following three proportions:

(a) 2 equals 2.
(b) 2 is several times greater than 2.
(c) 2 is several times greater than 3.

—The Lynchburg Virginian describes an ingenious trap devised by a Virginia farmer to capture sheep-killing dogs. Having suffered severely from the depredations of dogs upon his sheep fold, he built around a number of sheep that dogs had killed, an inclosure of rails twelve feet high and about ten feet square at the ground, the sides of the trap sloping inward until an opening was left about five feet square. Any dog could easily climb such a sloping fence and enter the pen, but not even a grey-hound could jump out of it. In three nights the farmer captured forty-six dogs, including fifteen or twenty, that had never been seen before in that neighborhood.

—Now, as the school days have come, and the young, as well as the old, read the COURIER, we will publish an old story for the benefit of the little fellows who have not had the experience in the world that we have.

We once knew a little boy who would not go to school. He monkeyed around town peddling bills for the shows, ringing bells for auctions, etc., anything under the shining sun to stay out of school. Well, he didn't amount to much as a scholar, but he could swear just like a grown person, chew dog-leg tobacco and lie like a stump speaker. There was a great and good man living in the same town who had gone to school when he was young, had been corporal in the militia, assistant secretary in a church choir, wore a plug hat and wanted to go to the legislature. Among his other vast possessions he owned a mule. As he (the mule, not the man) was rather light behind, and it was dangerous within a radius of forty feet from his heels, the statesman posted a sign, reading:

"BEWAIR THE MUEL."

People who had been to school, read the sign and "bewaired," but this bad boy couldn't read it, and he walked up as brave as a lion and took a good look at the animal. The sleepy mule glanced out of the corner of his north eye, and in two seconds the bad boy went through the roof and away up among the twinkling stars, until he could look down on the shining spires of the New Jerusalem. A part of him lit over in the next county and a part of him is going yet. His grief-stricken parents couldn't gather up enough to hold an inquest over, and it all happened because this bad boy didn't go to school.

Boys, remember, and when you start for school go there, and you may be wise and great, and sometime will be president of the day on the Fourth of July, or may be a lieutenant-governor.

Bennett Captured.

Bennett, the man who shot the marshal of Montpelier, in Williams county, Ohio, and whom the officers have been after for a week past, was arrested near Metz, in Steuben county, last Saturday. He was taken by Henry Aldrich and F. B. VanAuken, who had been so long principal of the schools in Waterloo. Mr. Aldrich overtook the fellow on the road to Metz, and, believing he knew him, asked him to ride. After some hesitation, Bennett consented, and the two rode along together chatting very socially. Coming to VanAuken's place, Aldrich made an excuse to go into the house, saying he wished to see Mr. V. about getting some cattle. Bennett remained in the buggy holding the lines. The two men soon came out of the house and down to the road, apparently engaged in a cattle trade. After talking long enough to satisfy them that they had the right man, they suddenly siezed him, and after a hard struggle, disarmed and bound him. They took him to Angola, and then to Bryan, Ohio, on a requisition from the Ohio authorities. The capture was well planned, and was carried out with a skill and coolness that do the captors great credit. It will not be a bad thing financially, either, as a reward of $500 had been offered for Bennett's arrest, dead or alive.

Baltimore Oriole.

This unique festival, which takes place at Baltimore, October 10, 11 and 12, is a new feature in the way of grotesque amusements. While it resembles the Mardi Gras of Memphis and New Orleans, it is at the same time free from many of the objectionable features of the latter. Great expense and pains have been taken to make the pageant a grand one. There will be a monster parade in the day-time, a novel feature of which will be the use of huge platform cars running on the tracks of the city railways, carrying thousands of maskers through the principal streets. At night the city will be illuminated by calcium and electric lights. The B. & O. gives half fare from all its regular stations, good for ten days to all who wish to see this splendid pageant.

—The concert given this week under the management of Mr. & Mrs. J. E. Kane, was quite a nice entertainment, and largely patronized. The scenery was beautiful, while the actors acquitted themselves in a very satisfactory manner. We will give a few notes which came under the observation of a COURIER reporter:

Geo. Staley and Conny Little acted as sextons and seated the "thirty cent" part of the audience.

Cal. Houser walked up and down the isle with an overcoat on and made the audience shiver.

Dr. Allen, jr., sold the tickets and kept up a continual smile while gazing upon the shining lucre.

The hall was lighted with the brilliancy of a "pon shop," that was on its last legs.

Sam. Puff was'nt there and the merry laugh of the audience had no variations.

Jenk Eldridge was "curtain puller" but he neglected to grease himself before the show began and the curtain acted very stubbornly.

The solo sang by Mrs. Kane was well received.

Mr. Kane can not walk off in the singing line any too well.

The grand marches dryads, etc., were altogether too lengthy.

Old Settlers at the Fair.

MESSRS EDITORS: At the last old settler's meeting, the officers of the Northeastern Agricultural Association, extended an invitation to all old settlers in the county to attend one day of their fair, to be held at Waterloo, commencing Oct. 6, 1881. That the old settlers, that is, those who were residents of DeKalb county on January 1, 1846 and still are residents of DeKalb county, would be admitted free, on Oct. 4, '81, upon the certificate of the secretary of the old settler's association. Certificates are now ready to be delivered on request by me, up to and including Oct. 1, 1881. On Oct. 3 and 4, such certificates can only be had of John Butt esq., of Waterloo, who has kindly consented to act on those days as my special deputy, at his hotel during the fair, and will issue certificates to those entitled. A register of each applicant will be made, giving name, age and date of settlement in the county. Those not personally acquainted with Mr. Butt or myself when they apply for certificates, will bring some person, who will vouch for them. It is hoped that all old settlers, who can, will accept and enjoy the generous invitation extended to them by the officers of the fair.

—Frank Strebe traded horses with the gypsies Monday. They changed harnesses and Frank bridled and placed the collar on his new steed. Bill Sthair slapped his right hand on his left knee and began laughing. But we digress. Frank pulled the thills on each side of the horse and—Tom. Sommers began "hollering" "Whoa, Blaze!" and Alf. Carter crawled in the bung-hole of a beer keg to hide himself. But again we digress. When the thills were in their proper place there was no harness on the horse, and some said that Frank was excited. He finally reached the Baptist church where the bell tolled. Night came on and we "got." Frank will follow horse swapping in the future, and those wishing to deal with him are hereby notified to call at his residence, at the north end of Van Buren street. THE EAST.

Gen. M. H. Avery, well known throughout the oil region, where he operated the first pipe-line, died at Geneva, N. Y. He commanded a brigade under Gen. Sheridan....Ex-Congressman Hendrick B. Wright died at his home at Wilkesbarre, Pa.

Lorenzo Delmonico, the famous restaurateur of New York, died of gout at Sharon Springs, N. Y. He was a native of Switzerland and arrived in New York in 1826. He left a fortune of about $200,000, after losing nearly a million in a petroleum speculation. Of late years he has smoked thirty strong cigars each day, made to his order in Havana, and no doubt this is partially responsible for his demise.....Lemuel Griffiths, an intemperate old man of Mount Carmel, Pa., who died under suspicious circumstances, had graveyard insurance placed upon him to the amount of $100,000, of which he was paid 1 per cent. by speculators.

Miss Mamie Leo, of Erie, Pa., who has been bedridden with spinal disease for the past four years, arose and went to church the other day, where her appearance caused Mrs. Croppe to faint. The cure is attributed to special prayer by several ladies....Mrs. Margaret Kane died in Brooklyn at the age of 107 years.

Boston was excited the other day over the strange atmospheric phenomenon which manifested itself there, and which in some instances created alarm. The sun was totally obscured, although the air was free from fog or mist; the atmosphere was pervaded with a strong yellowish light which made every object present a strange appearance. The grass appeared to be of a livid green, gas jets burned with a brilliancy which made them look like electric lights, and through the windows at various distances appeared star-like points of white light resembling electric lamps. The phenomenon was also noticeable in New Hampshire and in portions of Maine. At Providence, R. I., the day was very dark and the weather was very sultry. The gas had to be lighted at noon, but, owing to some disarrangement at the gas-works, went out at 3 o'clock, compelling offices and factories either to close or depend on candles.

In an attempt to torpedo an oil-well, near Bradford, Pa., four men were instantly killed, one fatally injured, and two seriously hurt. The report was heard for seven miles. ....John Kimmel, a tavernkeeper of Jamaica, L. I., killed his wife then set fire to his tavern, and then hanged himself.

THE WEST.

Reports received from the most of the Western States show that the number of hogs is one-quarter less than last year, and they are of small size and in poor condition. There is not the usual number of pigs, and there is a deficiency of food with which to fatten them for market....Duncan, the man who killed the printer Lowerre, at Chicago, has since died of the wounds received in the affray.

Reliable reports from Fort Apache and Fort Thomas leave no doubt that the reports of the Indian massacre in the vicinity of the former place were grossly exaggerated. Gen. Carr and the greater portion of the command were still alive at last advices, and were confident of being able to hold their own until the arrival of reinforcements. Gen. Carr's command lost seven men killed and two wounded in the fight with the redskins. It appears that on the morning of the 29th ult. he, with a force of 105 men, including Indian scouts and six officers, left Fort Apache with the intention of arresting an Apache medicine-man, who had been endeavoring to stir up the tribe to revolt. The command reached Cibicu, forty-five miles west of Fort Apache, on the 30th ult., and found 600 Indians there. The medicine-man was arrested without resistance, and the command began to retrace its steps. Some Indian scouts who had left their own camp and come into Gen. Carr's camp were ordered to leave. They refused to do so, but turned and fired, killing Capt. Hentig. The fight then became general. Our troops formed a skirmish line, and defended themselves until dark, after which they retreated to Fort Apache. The casualities among our troops were as follows: Killed: Capt. O. G. Hentig, Sixth cavalry; Private Saurdagger, Private Sullivan, Private Miller, Private Livingston, Private Bird, Private Faran, all of Company D, Sixth cavalry. Wounded: Lieut. C. G. Gordon, Sixth cavalry, in the leg, but not serious. Sergt. T. McDonald, Company E, Sixth cavalry, right leg, badly.

A dispatch from Columbus, Ohio, says that reports from the interior of the State indicate that the drought has been the most damaging experienced in twenty years. The showers of the past two or three days have come too late to be of much benefit except to pastures. Corn will not be more than half a crop. Many are predicting that corn will be worth $1.50 per bushel before another crop is harvested. Late corn will be cut for fodder only. There are no ears on the stalks. The potato crop will not yield one bushel this year to fifteen last year, and many will not be dug at all, as between the bugs and dry weather they have been totally used up. They are now commanding $1 per bushel, and it is predicted that $2 per bushel will be reached by Christmas....A passenger train on the Wabash road was wrecked near Shenandoah, Iowa. Twenty passengers were injured, the only one killed being Thomas C. Leacox, of Imogene, Iowa.

The giant-powder packing-house of the Lake Superior Powder Company, two miles northwest of Marquette, Mich., blew up with terrible effect on the morning of the 6th inst. There were eleven men in the building at the time, all of whose bodies were torn into fragments the average size of which were not larger than a man's hand. The building, which was a frame 26x60 feet and one story high, was blown into splinters and scattered over an area of twenty-four acres. The shock of the explosion was felt a distance of eight miles, and buildings in Marquette were terribly shaken. Half an hour after the explosion the place was crowded with people, all of whom assisted in searching the debris for flesh and bones of the killed. Of the eleven bodies part of one trunk only and about two patent pails full of remains were found. Following is a list of the killed, all of whom were unmarried men: John Reichels, Joseph Reichels, Jacob Smith, John Smith, Lewis Collins, Peter Laplant, Oliver Bishaw, Edward Murray, Fred Valrum, Charles Schmidt, John Anus. No plausible theory of the cause of the explosion has been advanced, and, as the men do not live who saw it, the cause will never be known.... All the Indians are reported to have left the western portion of the San Carlos reservation and gone in the direction of the Apaches. Intense alarm prevails among the whites at stations on the Southern Pacific east of Wilcox, and non-residents intending to leave are prevented from boarding trains. At stations between Deming and Wilcox temporary fortifications have been thrown up. Seventeen companies of troops are en route from California for Wilcox by special train; ten companies of the Sixth cavalry have been ordered forward, and the Fifth cavalry, Crook's veteran fighters, will be sent in hot haste from the Platte. A general uprising of the Arizona Apaches is expected.

Advices from Arizona report that the people of the mining camps in the Territory are gathering in large bodies for safety. Citizens of Tombstone, Bisbee and Charleston have ordered several cases of fire-arms from Tucson. The stampede of section-men along the Southern Pacific railroad makes it difficult to keep the line in running order. It was thought that the Apaches would separate into small bands and depredate exposed settlements.... A heavy snow-storm raged throughout the Black Hills on the 5th and 6th inst., prostrating all the telegraph wires. It is said that two feet fell, and there were six inches on a level at Deadwood. Hastings, Neb., had two inches of snow about the same time.

THE SOUTH.

The continued drought in Virginia and North Carolina is doing great damage to the tobacco and cotton crops of those States. And in some regions, through the same cause, the corn crop is a total failure. Cattle are suffering for want of water, and in some instances the people are suffering. Flour-mills run by water are idle, and the farmers in many quarters are selling their cattle for want of forage.

E. Lloyd Howard one of the leading physicians of Maryland, who for six years has had charge of the quarantine hospital at Baltimore, was drowned in attempting to step on the pier from a tug.

An Arkansas merchant who recently arrived in St. Louis says immense numbers of squirrels are overrunning the uplands of that State. In the absence of corn and nuts they are opening the cotton bolls, eating the seed and scattering the cotton on the ground and among the trees. Great quantities of cotton are being wasted in this way, he says.

A serious railroad accident occurred at Thornton Station, W. Va., on the Baltimore and Ohio railroad. The Chicago express ran into the Cumberland accommodation, telescoping the rear car and crushing the ends of the other cars. The shock detached the boiler from the engine trucks, the escaping steam adding greatly to the terrible effect of the accident. None of the passengers on the Chicago express sustained any injury, except a slight shaking up. Nearly all on the accommodation were injured, some shockingly mangled and scalded by the steam and more or less bruised. Eye-witnesses describe the scene as heart-rending in the extreme.

During the month of August 33,840 immigrants arrived in this country, and during the eight months ending Aug. 31, 318,475 immigrants arrived. During the eight months ending Aug. 31, 1880, 228,000 arrived....The railway shops at Gibson, N. B., valued at $70,000, were swept away by fire.

The care that was exercised in moving the President from Washington to Long Branch was good testimony to the concern of the people for his safety. No American President before this had enjoyed the luxury of a pilot-engine. That was formerly a privilege of royalty alone. Yet the life of the President is as valuable when he is in bodily health as when he is on the verge of dissolution. The express company in Washington not only sent out its steadiest horses to draw the wagon that carried the President, but appointed its trustiest man to drive them and put an attendant at the bridle-rein of each. The best engineers, firemen and conductors were selected, and each understood that he had a post of honor. The whole track was cleared and every precaution that ingenuity could suggest was taken to make the journey comfortable.

ANOTHER TRAIN ROBBERY.

A Chicago and Alton Passenger Train Boarded by Outlaws Near Glendale, Mo., and the Passengers Relieved of Their Valuables.

Kansas City, Mo., Sept 8.

Last evening, shortly after 9 o'clock, the incoming Chicago and Alton passenger train that left Chicago Tuesday at 12:30 was stopped and robbed by a band of robbers three miles east of Independence and fourteen east of Kansas City. The train was flagged and then ten or twelve men entered the cars and robbed the express-car, baggage-master, conductor, Pullman conductor and all the passengers, except in the rear car.

The ladies in the sleeping-car, some fifteen in number, were relieved of diamond earrings, rings, watches and money. They got about $2,500 from the passengers, and it is thought about the same amount from the express safe. The express messenger, H. A. Fox, was terribly beaten over the head with a revolver, and at last gave up the keys to the safe, and the robbers took all the contents. When they entered the Pullman car, five in number, all were masked, and while one held an open bag or pillow-case, each person was relieved of his or her valuables, which were thrown indiscriminately into the bag. The car conductor, J. J. Price, lost his watch and chain and $100.

J. M. Hazelbacher, the train conductor, ran through the train, alarming all passengers, and telling them that the robbers were on board, and then ran back and flagged a freight-train, running very close. He then came back to the train, and was at once searched, but had thrown his watch into the ladies' closet, and so they got nothing. One of the robbers poked a revolver into his face, and said, "That is the pistol that killed Westfall, on the Rock Island road, and it will kill you if you stir." The same man said he was Jesse James, and that they robbed the Alton train because it had joined with the Rock Island and others to capture the outfit. He also said they would burn the cars and bridges if an organized pursuit was made. Another man in the gang also said he was Jesse James, and, after robbing the engineer, Choke Foote, gave him back $2 and told him, when he reached Kansas City, to go and get a drink and quit railroading out in this section, or he would be killed the next time. The robbers talked all the time and all wore white masks. Some had hats on, and some had not, but all wore long dusters. They were armed with shotguns, old-fashioned blunderbusses and pistols, and had on high-top boots and farmers' clothes.

The place where the robbery took place is in a deep cut, near where the Missouri Pacific track crosses it, and the country is hilly and well wooded, and just suitable for such a robbery. It is only a few miles from Glendale, where the Alton train was robbed in 1879, by Jesse James and gang, when they secured $15,000. As soon as the robbers had gone through all the passengers, they told the engineer to pull out, and said: "Good night. This is the last of the James boys' gang."

T. F., or Frank Burton, the brakeman, made the following statement of the robbery: He said: "I was standing on the front platform of the sleeper when the train stopped, and I heard voices and oaths on the back platform. I said, in a moment: 'We are going to be robbed.' Then one of the robbers cried out: 'We are coming in and going through you all.'

"I remembered that the freight train was just behind us, and I heard it coming up. I jumped off and ran with my lantern down the track. They commenced shooting at me. The bullets whistled all around me and struck the rails and stones. They must have fired twenty-five shots. The engineer said: 'For God's sake don't shoot the boy. He is saving the lives of these people.' Then one of them threw up his arms and cried: 'Stop shooting!' I rolled into the cut and waved my lantern.

"The freight train was stopped only a car-length off. When I came back the robbers said: 'Have you lost anything?' I answered: 'Fifty cents.' He said: 'Show me the —— and I will kill him.' He gave me $1.50 for interest. Then I heard one of the robbers say to the engineer: 'Choppy Foote, you are too good a man to keep up this business. Here's $2 to buy a drink in the morning, and to drink it for Jesse James.'

"I warn you you'll be killed if you don't leave this road. We are going to tear up and bust the Alton and Rock Island roads, for they've been offering rewards for us. We've no grudge against the Pullmans, and we'll switch off their cars and burn the rest. I am the man who killed Westlake at Winston. He was too smart, and drew a revolver." Burton did not believe it was Jesse James, or any of his gang. They all acted green at the business, and he thought they were men living in the vicinity. They made no attempt to disguise their voices.

The new play of Gus Williams, "Wanted, a Carpenter," is the attraction at McVickers Theater, Chicago, this week. It is a laughter-provoking comedy, and contains a very odd conceit. Owing to a too literal translation from the German, the name Karl Zimmerman is transformed into Charles Carpenter. When it becomes desirable to find the original his identity is lost. Meanwhile he has gone into business as a detective, in which capacity he is engaged to search for—himself. The change of names takes place in his infancy, and he is not aware of it. The comedian makes the best of these ludicrous situations.

A TORNADO OF FLAME.

Particulars of the Terrible Michigan Conflagrations—Appalling Destruction of Life and Property.

Detroit, Mich., Aug. 9.

The scene of the terrible tornado of flame in the lower Michigan peninsula may be readily placed in the mind of the casual reader by the aid of the following explanation: The southern peninsula of Michigan has the form, on the map, of a left-hand mitten, laid on its palm. The space between the thumb and fingers is represented by Saginaw bay. Huron county forms the end of the thumb, and beneath it, on the map, lie Tuscola and Sanilac counties, side by side, Sanilac to the eastward. Bad Ax is in the center of Huron county, and is the county seat, and Caro is in the center of Tuscola county, and is the county seat. Each of the three counties has about twenty-four townships six miles square.

The loss of life and property is immense. A dispatch from Lexington says that dead bodies are being brought in from all directions. It is estimated that 500 people are homeless and in immediate want of assistance. The farmers in newer townships lose live stock, houses, barns, crops, everything. A farmer who just came in from Austin township saved his family of eight children in a field of buckwheat, but he says the whole country in that part is totally destroyed and many lives have been lost.

The loss of live stock is simply immense. The older settled townships escaped with but little loss, but in most of the newer townships nothing remains but a fire-swept, blackened wilderness.

A dispatch from Marlette, Sanilac county, says a terrible state of affairs exists at that point. The entire section of the country lying to the north and east of that place has been on fire, and the number of families rendered homeless will reach the hundreds. Up to this time seventeen persons are known to have met their death by fire. The horse of Ira Humphrey, the mail carrier between this place and Davis Corners, came home badly burned, with a card attached to the saddle written by Humphrey, stating his peril from fire. A relief party found him on the road dead. He was entirely denuded of his clothes, either having been burned on his person, or torn off by himself in his desperation. In the township of Argyle, Huron county, the following were burned dead: Paul Wetzel, wife and five children; George Krotch, wife and three children; Mrs. Morris Welch and two children; James Gilson, and two women, recently from Canada, names unknown.

The Rev. Z. Grenell, Jr., pastor of the First Baptist Church, of this city, arrived from Sand Beach at noon to-day by the Narrow-Gauge and Grand Trunk, passing through most of the burned region in Sanilac county. He gave a reporter a graphic and fearful description of the calamity as he saw it, and heard of it from eye-witnesses. On his way to Port Huron by the Narrow-Gauge railroad it was noticed that, in some places, the railroad track had proved an effectual barrier to the flames, which did not find fuel in the gravel of the road-bed. In other places, however, it burned the ties and twisted and destroyed the rails, which had to be replaced. In other places it had leaped clear over the road, and taken a new start on the other side. For the most part, it got across in some way, and the spots of unburnt country were small, few, and far between. From the car-windows, all the way, it presented to the view the aspect of a burned desert of ashes and smoldering embers, without a sign of animal or vegetable life, a country abandoned by God and man, and to which it was impossible to imagine any one returning. The telegraph poles had all burned, and the wires had been reset upon any stick that could be found, and, for long distances, were merely laid along the ties beside the rails.

One of the most singular and appalling phenomena accompanying the calamity was the awesome darkness which preceded it and remained until all was over. The experience of Sand Beach will illustrate that of the whole lake shore. At sunrise Monday the air was as clear as usual. At 1 p. m. the people began to observe a singular copper-colored appearance of the whole firmament. A little later this deepened to a red, and by 3 o'clock it was so dark that people were compelled to take lanterns to find their way out of doors. Mr. Jenks, a well-known citizen, said that he passed his hand back and forth before his face and could not see. The fearful darkness continued all the afternoon, with an occasional rift, through which the rays of the sun darted furtively with unnatural brightness, to be succeeded immediately by still more blinding blackness.

Many thought the end of the world was at hand, and were filled with terror. The horrors of the imagination were soon intensified by the approach of the flames, the stories of the universal desolation to the west of them, the dread that they were fated to a frightful death, and then by the arrival of the charred, blackened and shapeless remains of the poor victims. This awful condition continued all along the shore until Wednesday morning at 8 o'clock, when the wind, which had been blowing steadily from the west, turned suddenly from the north, carrying the cool, moist air of the lake to the fevered heads and smoke-and-ash-begrimed faces of the people. It was sweet as the breath of God, and was accepted as thankfully.

The scenes of horror in the woods were too frightful for any pen to portray. The dead were found everywhere, very rarely recognizable, and in most cases undistinguishable as human beings. Many were mere masses of burnt flesh, which fell apart when touched, and in very few could sex or age be distinguished. From one body the head fell when it was lifted up; from another, that of a young woman, the leg separated and hung suspended by the tendons. In some places families were found reduced to an undistinguishable heap of roasted and blackened blocks of flesh, where they fell together, overwhelmed by the rushing flames. The manifold horrors of the calamity were multiplied by fearful tornadoes, which cut off retreat in every direction. The awful heat of the atmosphere raised the smoke a little from the ground, and it hung above the earth in an impenetrable mass, shutting out all light, and leaving the poor creatures below helpless and blind, until the fire caught them and closed their agony in death. Now and then flames shot up in tremendous masses, which would be seized by a tornado and carried bodily a quarter of a mile away, and then pushed down again to start the flames in a new quarter. In this way helpless fugitives flying for life were penned in by seas of flame, and roasted like rats in a cage. One farmer, a few miles from Sand Beach, who was plowing with oxen, on noticing the approaching darkness, and thinking he had plenty of time, waited to turn his cattle and horses loose. He then hurried to the house, and, finding his wife gone to a neighbor, took two children himself, and gave three others in charge of his oldest daughter. Before they got many rods from the house the flames had got before them. He hurried off in another direction with his two youngest, but the girl pushed on over the burning grass with the other three. He escaped. The bodies of the other four were afterward found in a heap, charred beyond recognition.

John Ballentine, of Verona Mills, says that fifty-three lives were known to be lost in the neighborhood of Sand Beach. The fire suddenly reached Verona Mills on Monday, and the town was soon wiped out. The wind was so strong that Ballentine and wife were picked up and blown fifteen or twenty yards. A woman and her husband were found lying against a tree, dead, the woman being partly delivered of a child. The devastation caused by the fires of 1871 is nothing in comparison to the fires of the past few days. In the vicinity of Richmondville Western, Forester and Marcer townships reliable information leads one to say that upward of 300 persons perished in the flames. There was no escape for them. The woods and ground were so dry that no warning of danger was given. Faster than a race-horse came the fire. It would embrace a house or a barn with its contents and away to the next. Persons who have been through the terrible ordeal say that in ten minutes from the time the fire struck there would be no vestige of a house left.

A correspondent says: "I have just returned from a trip through the burned district, and a description of the sights would make the reader's blood turn cold. In many instances men, women and children were found lying on their faces in the road, where they had fallen when overtaken by the fire. Children were lying on logs, where they had clambered for safety. There was no finding each other when once separated. Many took refuge in wells and root-houses, thinking to escape, but in almost every instance were suffocated. Details of the disaster in Huron are as bad as here. I believe that when the returns are in 1,000 persons will be found to have perished in the flames. Forester township will turn out Thursday to bury the dead cattle, sheep and horses, the stench from which is unbearable. The Rev. W. T. Allington found sixteen dead bodies near Deckerville. Only five buildings were left between that place and Minden. John Flytewager's family, seven children and wife, were all burned together in Paris township, with fifteen others. The Day family were burned, Morris Clifford, wife and child. A man and woman are lying dead in the road between Donner's mill and Tyre. Fifteen families were burned in Moore and Argyle. Five hundred families are reported at Minden as having been burned out. A woman and seven head of cattle were burned at Smith's mill, half a mile from Tyre. Wherever a house is left people flock to it like sheep to the fold, in some places as many as six families being in a log shanty. They must have relief from the blow or great suffering will be the result. I saw many families to-day who had not one meal since Monday, and who do not know when they will get one. Their teams are all gone, and their cows and other stock burned. Desolation stares them in the face. They talk about their misfortune, and many of them say, bad as it is, it might be a great deal worse. They are glad to get away with their lives. Many of the men are Canadians, who have been over but a short time and have just begun to get things in comfortable shape. Many need medicine and medical attendance."

The following appeal has been issued by the committee of citizens of Port Huron, headed by Senator Conger, Mayor Carleton and others:

To the People of the United States:

A most appalling disaster has fallen upon a large portion of the counties of Huron and Sanilac, with some adjacent territory, a section of country recently covered with forest, and now occupied by nearly 50,000 people, largely recently settled, and either poor or in very moderate circumstances. In the whole of this section there has been but little rain during the past two months, and everything was dry, when on Monday, Sept. 5, a hurricane swept over it, carrying with it a sheet of flame that hardly anything could withstand. We have advices of 200 persons burned to death, many of them by the roadside or in the fields while seeking places of safety, and it is probable that twice this number have perished. We have reports from twenty or more townships, in which scarcely a house, barn or supplies of any kind are left, and thousands of people are destitute and helpless. All of these people require immediate assistance, and most of them must depend on charity for months to come. We are doing all in our power to succor them, but the necessities of the case are so great that contributions from charitable people throughout the country will be required to keep them throughout the winter. We, therefore, appeal to you to send money, clothing, bedding, provisions, or any other supplies that will help maintain the sufferers, and enable them to provide shelter for themselves, and begin work again on their farms. Contributions may be sent to the Mayor, E. C. Carleton, Chairman of the Relief Committee appointed by the citizens of Port Huron, who have sent agents through the burned district to ascertain the wants of the sufferers and distribute supplies.

PRESIDENT GARFIELD.

Washington, Sept. 3.

The President gained slightly yesterday. His symptoms last night were somewhat more favorable than on the previous night, and through the day his pulse was less frequent and more steady than it had been the day before. He relished his food rather better than at any time since his relapse. The patient is still very weak. The parotid gland continues to suppurate and has not yet commenced to heal, and the wound has not improved much. The most hopeful symptoms are the patient's growing appetite, the healthy condition of his stomach, and the readiness with which the food he partakes of is assimilated. Yesterday he took some soup, and chewed a piece of stewed squirrel, and asked for more, but it was not deemed well to accede to his request. The patient evinces a great desire to be removed from the capital, and, though the physicians do not think it safe to comply with his wishes in that matter just at present, they are free to say that as soon as it can be safely done they will advise his removal, probably to Long Branch.

Washington, Sept. 5.

The President's condition on Saturday night seemed to be assuming the grave features of another relapse. Owing to the efforts made to clean his throat, the stomach was so much irritated as to cause two spells of nausea and vomiting. During Sunday he had no recurrence of this difficulty, but the pulse ruled higher than it had for two previous days. The parotid gland is nearly recovered, the wound showing no material change. Arrangements are being made for the removal of the President to Long Branch within a very few days. The attending physicians believe that this is absolutely necessary, and, although the experiment is an extremely critical one, it is thought that his stay at the White House will be not less dangerous. A car prepared for the purpose by the Pennsylvania road is on its way to the capital. Forty men finished the repairs in seven hours. The seats were taken out, storm and folding doors inserted, the parlor apartment inclosed by wire gauze, Brussels carpet laid on the floor, and two large ice-boxes constructed. The President talks constantly about his trip, and experienced some difficulty in getting to sleep last night.

Washington, Sept. 6.

The President was somewhat restless yesterday and last night, in consequence of the extreme heat, though there was no material change, either for the better or worse. At this hour (5 a. m.) everything is ready for the removal of the patient from the White House to Long Branch, where it is hoped the bracing air will have the effect of restoring the much-suffering, much-loved patient to health and strength. He will be moved from the White House to the railway station in a treasury wagon, and nothing that patience, ingenuity or thoughtful solicitude can suggest has been left undone to make the removal as easy and little hurtful to the patient's condition as possible. He will be conveyed from the depot at Washington to Long Branch in a car specially prepared, over a track covered with sawdust, and drawn by an anthracite engine, so that there shall be the least possible amount of noise. The patient himself exhibits great anxiety to be removed, and the physicians hope for the best results on account thereof.

Long Branch, Sept. 7.

The President was removed from the White House to Long Branch at an early hour yesterday morning. Every preparation had been made with the utmost care. Every detail had been prepared with great prudence. The arrangements were so perfect, the details so carefully arranged, that the President was removed without the slightest break in the programme, and with much less disturbance even than had been expected. Shortly before 6 o'clock Dr. Bliss, Dr. Boynton, Dr. Reyburn, Gen. Swaim, Col. Rockwell and Col. Corbin took the stretcher, three upon a side, and lifted it. The President did not indicate that he was aware of what was being done. They carried the bed through the room to the corridor, and, without any trouble whatever, and without the knowledge of the President, took it down the broad staircase to the front door. Meanwhile Mrs. Garfield, her daughter, Miss Rockwell and Mrs. Edson had taken a carriage, driven by Albert, the coachman, and had gone to the train. Dr. Agnew, Dr. Woodward and Dr. Reyburn had followed in another carriage. Just before they left the room they sent word down stairs and the express-driver took the horses which he is accustomed to drive and attached them to the huge Adams Express wagon used for treasury purposes. By the time the horses were attached the bed had reached the front door, and it was the work of but a moment to place the President on the wagon. Thirteen soldiers stood near by ready for any service, but they were not then needed. The wagon was so large and the platform was so accurately built that it was easy to take the President in the wagon without the slightest disturbance. Three of the gentlemen sat upon one side of the wagon and three upon the other, while the stretcher rested upon their knees. This made the best kind of cushion and spring, and rendered jolting, if there was careful driving, almost impossible. In a moment after the President had been placed upon the wagon, Dr. Bliss said to the driver: "We are all ready. Drive very slowly and carefully." The horses started as though they knew the errand on which they were engaged, and at a slow walk came down the roadway to the gate. The sun was just rising, and as the President left the White House the lights were put out. When the gate was reached there was a turn made necessary into the avenue, and a slight jolt of the wagon was perceptible. At this time the President tossed his head upon his pillow. He lay upon a mattress over which was placed a blanket, and upon which rested a low pillow. A coverlid and sheet were over his body, reaching about to the breast. His hands were hid beneath these coverings. Dr. Bliss held one hand with a constant pressure on the pulse, and Dr. Reyburn was similarly occupied with the other. Gen. Swaim, who sat on one side of the wagon, and Col. Rockwell, who was upon the other, were constantly fanning the President. He did not seem, by the most authentic statement, to be aware of what was going on. After Pennsylvania avenue was reached the President lay quietly, and his face exposed to the view of those who were upon the sidewalks, seemingly asleep. There were but few people there to witness this dramatic departure, but those who were upon the sidewalks involuntarily lifted their hats and strong men with tears streaming from their eyes as they saw that sallow, emaciated face prayed "God save our President." The wagon was slowly drawn to the Sixth street depot, ten policemen marching on each side. A detail of artillerymen helped to back the wagon to the door of the car, and the cot was jolted somewhat. The President was lifted on the mattress and placed on the bed erected in the car. As soon as Mrs. Garfield began to fan him the signal was given for departure, the train moving off at 6:30. The surgeons found a decrease of five beats in the pulse. A pilot engine ran a few minutes ahead of the Presidential train. People throughout the region traversed maintained absolute quiet. Long Branch was reached at 1:10 p. m., and the patient was quietly transferred to the Francklyn cottage, where a squad of thirty artillerymen are on guard. The evening bulletin, announcing a rise in the pulse to 124, caused some apprehensions. Secretary Blaine, in a cablegram to Minister Morton, reported the President sleeping quietly and his fever abating, and stated that the surgeons regard his symptoms as a necessary result of his journey.

Long Branch, Sept. 8.

With the disadvantage of having to endure one of the hottest days of the season, it is not surprising that the President has made slow progress during the last twenty-four hours. Yesterday the thermometer was 94 degrees in the shade, and the patient was fanned nearly all day by five attendants. His pulse ranged from 108 to 124 throughout the day. This morning the fever has entirely subsided, the patient's temperature is only a little above the normal, and he is resting quietly. He has partaken of the usual amount of food. Enemata were also administered. Dr. Hamilton said last evening that, notwithstanding the exceedingly hot weather, the President's case looked "exceedingly favorable." Dr. Bliss said: "The President is better in more ways than one. The wound and gland are both doing well, and the only troublesome feature is the extreme weakness of the patient." Dr. Reyburn said that, while the President had not gained a great deal of ground yesterday, he had certainly held his own, and that he had entirely recovered from the effects of his journey. The patient rallied from the fatigue consequent on his journey more readily than was anticipated. Drs. Reyburn, Barnes and Woodward have withdrawn from the corps of attending surgeons, in obedience to the expressed wish of the President, who believes that a fewer number of physicians can manage his case as well as the number heretofore employed. Mrs. Garfield conveyed her husband's wishes to the surgeons named, and they had no hesitation in complying with his wish. The other physicians express regret that gentlemen in whose professional capacity they have unbounded confidence, and whose friendship they value, should have to withdraw at this juncture, but it was deemed best that the patient's wishes should be complied with.

Long Branch, Sept. 9.

A change in the wound yesterday, followed by a lower temperature, caused a marked change for the better in the condition of the suffering President. At noon yesterday his pulse stood at 94, and at the evening dressing 100. He took a liberal amount of both liquid and solid food, including the greater part of a broiled partridge. Dr. Bliss said yesterday that the great change for the better in the patient's condition indicates convalescence! The gland and wound, he said, were both doing well. The discharge from the gland was quite sufficient, and from the wound was more free and of a better character. The wound looked much healthier, and the color was much better in every respect. Dr. Bliss stated in a quite jubilant manner that the President would yet be able to communicate to Congress. The services of Mrs. Dr. Edson have been dispensed with, and six personal friends of the President will guard him day and night. The vigorous demand of the patient that a reclining-chair should be forwarded from the White House caused an order to be telegraphed to that effect.

AUBURN COURIER.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 15, 1881.

Senator Edmunds is said to be failing in health.

Senator Ingalls, of Kansas, is the father of ten children.

A baby weighing thirty-two pounds was born at Washington. Its father is an undertaker.

The use of beer in Paris is rapidly taking the place of wine. No less than 25,000 saloons in Paris retail beer.

The Jewish population of Vienna is reported to have more than doubled itself, according to the recent census, within the past ten years. In 1870 it was 30,200. It is now 72,000.

An eagle was shot in California recently, measuring ten feet from tip to tip of its wings, while in the act of carrying off a lamb. This is claimed to be the largest bird of the kind ever killed on the coast.

A gold watch, lost by Mrs. Peck on an island at Oconomowoc, Wis., nine years ago, was found the other day. Upon being taken to a jeweler, it was found to be uninjured, and, when wound up, kept time as good as new.

Max Strakosch, her brother-in-law, does not believe that Patti will come to America. As she had announced the price of admission to her concerts at $5 per capita, it does not matter much whether she comes or not.

The Tombstone Epitaph mentions, as one of the most engaging sights in that fast city of the frontier, a stalwart negro who strolls up and down the streets at intervals, ringing a bell and proclaiming that game of keno is about to begin at the establishment to which he is attached.

With a view, apparently, to prevent bigamous complications on the part of her inconstant husband, a woman in South Africa advertises as follows in the Colonial papers: "Notice—Ministers and magistrates are respectfully requested not to marry Isaac Sampson, who has already a wife and family."

The massive frame to the picture of Mrs. Hayes, at the White House, was carved entirely by women. The oak represents strength of character in Mrs. Hayes; the bunches of grapes denote the true use of God's goodness. The lilies along the sides indicate purity. The Egyptian sunflowers are expressive of her Christian faith; the laurel, victory; water lilies, beauty, and the hawthorn, poetry.

The Queen of England has a fortune of $80,000,000, and an annual income of $3,250,000. Her children are cared for in magnificent pauperdom by the state. And yet England is not more generous to her royalty than America to her commercial princes. Vanderbilt has a property of $120,000,000, and an income of $10,000,000, while Gould is worth $100,000,000 in his own right, and is sovereign over 11,714 miles of rail, capitalized at $646,500,000.

Col. Cash, of Cashville, S. C., who killed Col. Shannon, his neighbor, in a duel, and was acquitted of a charge of murder on the plea of self-defense, has written a tribute to his victim. "No braver man," says the sympathetic survivor, "ever bit the dust. He died upon the ramparts of the enemy, and, with a smile upon his face, dropped into a hero's grave." This remarkable sentence, pronounced to be "an eloquent panegyric" by the local paper, illustrates the sentiment of the community that will acquit a man of the cold-blooded, deliberate murder Col. Cash committed.

President Garfield began to mend after all of his physicians had given up hope of his recovery. It will be remembered that a few years ago Charles O'Conor's physicians left his bedside, declaring they could do no more, and that death was near. The patient had received the last rites of the church. Then he was given a bit of food which he had craved and been denied, and he directly made way toward health. The Prince of Wales was pronounced past hope by his doctors a few years ago, and he turned back from the grave on the Sunday which had been designated as a day of prayer throughout the United Kingdom for his recovery.

A "sugar refining company," says the Chicago Tribune, in Iowa has shut down "owing to the high price of corn." The malt factories will be the next to go. The mysterious sympathy which exists between corn on the one hand, and sugar, malt, sirup and various other products on the other, has long been the subject of common remark. Its ramifications go farther than most people suppose. An advance in corn, for example, makes hogs worth more, and the cost of hogs affects the value of grease, which is the base of oleomargarine. The price of butter, for some unexplained reason, depends more upon the supply of grease than upon the activity of the dairies. "Sympathy" is the universal law of trade. Articles of merchandise apparently the most diverse in their ingredients and uses advance and fall in price by the operation of this mysterious law. Alum and baking-powder, chiccory and coffee, cabbage-leaves and cigars, rise and fall together. Does one wish to know the price of chewing tobacco, he looks at the quotations of licorice. Would you learn what flour is worth, then see what meal is held at. Terra alba and confectionery go together; so do cheap shoes and paper, calico and starch, chalk and milk. There is nothing in nature more beautiful than this secret law of sympathy between inanimate objects.

History of an Extraordinary Case in Surgery.

Aug. 2.—Extremely hopeful.

Aug. 7.—Bad febrile symptoms.

Aug. 8.—Second operation. Discharge of pus through lower incision in back.

Aug. 9.—The President wrote his name.

Aug. 10.—He signed an extradition paper.

Aug. 11.—He wrote a letter to his mother.

Aug. 14.—Nausea, vomiting and physical prostration.

Aug. 18.—Inflammation of the right parotid gland.

Aug. 19.—Drainage-tube inserted nine inches deeper in wound in back.

Aug. 21.—Vomited twice during the afternoon.

Aug. 22.—Surgeons first acknowledge the existence of septicemia for ten days.

Aug. 24.—Suppuration of the parotid gland; incision and discharge of pus; consultation of doctors to which Dr. Agnew was hurriedly called.

Aug. 25.—Another consultation, at which it was decided that the President could not be removed.

Aug. 26.—The President's mind wandered during the night. The parotid gland discharged through the ear.

Aug. 27.—Pulse more frequent and patient feebler. Discharge of pus from the parotid gland through the ear.

Aug. 28.—The President ate some milk toast. Another incision was made above the swollen gland, followed by discharge of healthy-looking pus. The wound rather less indolent.

Aug. 29.—Another incision near the parotid gland, followed by a fair discharge of healthy-looking pus in the evening. The parotid swelling perceptibly diminishing.

Aug. 30.—Another incision on the lower side of the face; glandular swelling diminishing more freely.

Aug. 31.—Discovery of an opening from the gland into the mouth. Swelling diminishing; increased relish for food.

Sept. 2.—The President appears better than for some days. He has taken more nourishment; little change in the wound; restless during the night.

Sept. 3.—Parotid swelling continues to discharge and diminish in size. Ate a fair breakfast of milk-toast and some reed birds. In the evening he vomited. The surgeons determined to remove the President from Washington, to escape the malarial fever, which threatened death. Long Branch decided on as more convenient for the surgeons.

Sept. 4.—The President vomited about 1 o'clock a. m., but slept well most of the night. During the day no return of the irritability of the stomach. Improvement of the parotid gland, and contour of the face restored. More fatigue after dressing of the wound.

Sept. 5.—The hottest day and night of a very hot summer.

Sept. 6.—Successful removal of the President over the Pennsylvania railroad to Long Branch.

Durability of Teak.

The Chinese and Japanese build most of their vessels of teak. This wood is very durable, and will stand the water better than any other wood that is used for shipbuilding. According to the Australasian Shipping News, there lies at the bottom of Dusky bay a large vessel that can be plainly seen in clear water. She has been there for centuries, and the Maoris have a legend about her. They say that their grandfathers told them that in their childhood a large vessel sank in Dusky bay; that the crew managed to reach one of the small islands and after living there for years died off one by one. Who they were or where they came from the Maoris could not say. A diver is said to have recently examined this mysterious old hulk. He reported that she is built of teak and appears to be still perfectly sound and firm.

Booth's Body.

The Washington correspondent of the Buffalo Commercial writes: "It was only after some patient inquiry that I could ascertain the facts, which are interesting and, as far as I know, are yet unpublished. Booth, the murderer of Abraham Lincoln, died as will be remembered, in a barn in Maryland, from a wound received from the musket of Boston Corbett. The body was brought to Washington, and, after having been identified by the court martial before which his fellow conspirators were tried, was dissected by the surgeon-general of the army. The brain and heart and some parts of the body were preserved in alcohol and are now on exhibition in the medical museum of the surgeon-general's office. The building in which the assassination occurred was Ford's theater. The government confiscated it, but afterward Ford was paid its full value, and has since been used as the headquarters of the medical corps of the army. The brain and heart of Booth are in jars, standing in a case that is situated very near the actual scene of the assassination. After the surgeons had done with Booth's body it was buried in a grave in the arsenal grounds. Only half a dozen persons knew the exact spot, which was unmarked. In 1867 Edwin Booth, the actor, sent Mr. Weaver, the sexton of Christ Church, Baltimore, to Washington, with the request that the remains of his brother might be taken up and removed to the family burial place. After some delay, the request was granted by President Johnson, who was finally appealed to, and Mr. Weaver took the body to the cemetery in Baltimore, and buried it beside the elder Booth and others of the family. The removal was conducted with great secrecy and was concealed from Secretary Stanton, who had refused to give his consent.

The Causes of Dew.

If dew fell it would fall for the same reason that rain falls; but dew does not fall. It is simply a deposit of moisture always contained in the air to a greater or less degree, and which, when there is enough of it, will always form on any cold body exposed to the moist air, in precisely the same way that a cold bottle or stone, taken from a cold cellar and suddenly exposed in the shade to the moist, warm summer air, will become wet. This is not sweating nor does this moisture come out of the bottle or stone as many people believe, but from the air. It is for the same reason that moisture will condense against the window-panes when the air is cold outside and moist inside, the moisture slowly freezing while its deposits form crystal ice which we so often admire in winter. When the weather is cool enough the moisture will even freeze plants and grass, and then we call it hoar frost; if it does not freeze it is simply dew. The only point left to be explained is why does the ground become so cool during the night, so much cooler than the air above, as to cause the latter to deposit its moisture. This was for many years a vexed problem till Wells first suggested the radiation of obscure heat, which takes place from the surface of the earth through the clear atmosphere into the space above, and so causes the surface to become much cooler than the air itself. He demonstrated this by means of thermometers placed at different heights, and also by the fact that dew is only deposited on cloudless nights. When there are clouds they reflect the heat or prevent it from escaping. The surface of the earth thus being kept from cooling, no dew is deposited.

Heaving the Lead.

The Fanny was coming down the Mississippi, loaded with piglead. As she was going over a shoal place the pilot gave the signal to heave the lead. The only man forward at the time was a green Irishman. "Why don't you heave the lead?" "Is it to heave the lead, your Honor? Where to?" "Overboard, you blockhead!" The Irishman snatched up one of the pigs of lead and threw it overboard; the mate, in endeavoring to prevent him, lost his balance and fell into the river. The Captain, running to the edge of the deck, asked; "Why don't you heave the lead, and sing out how much water there is?" "The lead is heaved, your Honor, and the mate has gone down to see how much water there is," responded Pat.

It requires 10,296 gas and 2,368 oil lamps to light the streets of Boston.

Holloway's Pills.

Never dispair—something that never fails—Fever and Ague—To the sick it is of little consequence how they are cured, whether from a rational view of the disease or by the rules defined for the guidance of the profession, so long as the cure is certain and expeditious. To a suffering man the question on the relative merits of quinine or calomel is uninteresting. The faculty may wrangle and discuss their various theories, but Dr. Holloway's treatment dispells doubt are the disciples of Esculapius have finished the first stage. Holloway's Pills are the only remedies which effect a speedy and radical cure without danger of a relapse. Read the advertisement elsewhere.

How Watches are Made.

It will be apparent to any one, who will examine a SOLID GOLD WATCH, that aside from the necessary thickness for engraving and polishing, a large proportion of the precious metal used is needed only to stiffen and hold the engraved portions in place, and supply the necessary solidity and strength. The surplus gold is actually needless so far as UTILITY and beauty are concerned. In JAMES BOSS' PATENT GOLD WATCH CASES, this WASTE of precious metal is overcome, and the SAME SOLIDITY AND STRENGTH produced at from one-third to one half of the usual cost of solid cases. This process is of the most simple nature, as follows: a plate of nickle composition metal, especially adapted to the purpose, has two plates of SOLID GOLD soldered one on each side. The three are then passed between polished steel rollers, and the result is a strip of heavy plated composition, from which the cases, backs, centres, bezels etc., are cut and shaped by suitable dies and formers. The gold in these cases is sufficiently thick to admit of all kinds of chasing, engraving and enameling; the engraved cases have been carried until worn perfectly smooth by time and use without removing the gold.

THIS IS THE ONLY CASE MADE WITH TWO PLATES OF SODID GOLD AND WARRANTED BY SPECIAL CERTIFICATE.

PROFESSOR WARD'S ADVENTURE IN A NEW ZEALAND VOLCANO.

[Utica Morning Herald.]

Professor Henry A Ward, formerly of the University of Rochester, N. Y., is writing letters touching his travels in New Zealand, some of which detail singular experiences. In his last he says: "I came from Auckland by steamer south for one hundred twenty-five miles along the east coast to the town of Tamanga. I hired a twenty-ton cutter and started to visit the sea volcano. We sailed all night and at daybreak we had before us a great mountain of black scoria, 830 feet high, from the top of which, with much force, went white clouds of vapor to a height of fully two thousand feet. Reaching the shore it was not easy traveling, for in places the black pebbles of the beach were all astir with water boiling up through them—water so hot that a misstep might scald the foot seriously. At this point the crater wall has been broken down almost to the sea level, and we could look into the great hollow island. The crater is circular, a full mile in diameter, and hemmed in by walls many hundred feet high and very precipitous. The crater floor has an uneven plain of volcanic ash and scoria, with many little fumaroles or blow-holes, through which hot sulphur vapors come wheezing out, while every few minutes there was beneath our feet a smart trembling and a low, dull rolling roar. The smoke of vapor began to thicken as we went along, and we soon found the cause. We were stopped short by a great lake of streaming water, quite filled this end of the crater, and being, as we could see when the clouds lifted, nearly half a mile from either side. The water was too hot to comfortably bear the hand in it, and was further insupportable to either touch or taste by a strong infusion of alum and sulphuric acid, which bit painfully at any scratch or sore upon our skin. On the further border of the lake and half around its shore was a row of the most violent solfataras which I have ever seen. They had built for themselves little pillar-like cones, from ten to thirty feet high and a yard or two in diameter at the base, and through these open chimneys they were trumpeting steam and roaring sulphuric gases with a violence that was frightful to contemplate, and such demoniacal screeching and din as afflicted our ears, even at the long distance where we stood. We dragged the row-boat along the volcano's floor and launched it upon the boiling lake. The water of the lake was of a milky opaque cast, but we could feel with our oars that it was in some places not over ten feet deep. Lines upon the shore showed that it daily rose and fell slightly with the tide of the sea outside. In many spots the water was boiling furiously with so much froth and foam, while still its heat was much below the boiling point of 212 Fahrenheit. These were dangerous places, the abundant air in the water diminished materially in buoyancy, and our boat sank alarmingly low in crossing. We landed across the lake at one of the solfataras nearest to the beach, and proceeded to demolish it with our oars. It was a chimney about two feet in diameter, clay without, and within it was lined with crystals of sulphur of a beautiful strawyellow, splashed with vermillion spots. Pushing in the top of this chimney, the fragments would first fall down its throat and then come flying out into the air, with explosions that were amusingly like a prolonged stentorian cough."

GENTS.—I have been very low, and have tried everything, to no advantage. I heard your Hop Bitters recommended by so many, I concluded to give them a trial. I did, and now am around, and constantly improving, and am nearly as strong as ever. W. H. WELLER. 2w,

The First Discoverers of Petroleum.

It seems to be now pretty conclusively established that long before the discovery of petroleum in this country started the enormous speculation in oil wells which culminated ten or fifteen years ago, mineral oil had been obtained in Galicia, and its value as an illuminating agent demonstrated. Though we were the first to bring it prominently before the world, and to introduce it into general use, we must surrender to Galicia the honor of having first found out that mineral oil could be made to supply fuel for lamps.

An Austrian mining engineer, Herr Heinrich Walter, has lately contributed to a scientific publication of his country two papers, in which he presents proofs gathered with the most patient industry, and made so complete that we cannot disregard them, to show that so far back as the early part of this century petroleum was obtained by two miners of Galicia, distilled, and successfully employed for illuminating purposes. They were Josef Hecker and Johann Mitis, and they found the mineral oil between 1810 and 1817 in the neighborhood of Truscovich, where they were working sulphur and lead ore. The first mention of distilled petroleum occurs in the report of a lawsuit which took place in the latter year. In the same year "naphtha and mineral oil," probably distilled and raw petroleum, were formally tested by a commission organized by the mayor of Prague. The account of the trial in the municipal records declares that "naphtha possesses great advantages, both as regards economy and intensity of light." Accordingly the mayor ordered a supply of the oil of Hecker, to be delivered within a specified time, but the material came too late and was refused.

Nothing more was heard of petroleum until 1838, when it is mentioned as a mineral product in the account of a mining action at Starunia, and in the same year it was decided that the oil came under the classification of minerals subject to a State royalty. Little revenue, however, was received from that source, the product of the wells being used for wagon grease only. Petroleum was thus neglected until 1853 or 1854, when a man named Schreiner accidentally discovered its value as an illuminating agent, and as such it began to attract scientific attention in Austria. But before it had been brought into any use otherwise than experimentally, the discovery of petroleum in this country occured. Then the product, which had been neglected in Galicia for nearly half a century, was speedily made known to the whole world as a cheap and admirable illuminating agent, and it soon became one of the most important articles of commerce. Moreover, it was an American or an Americanized German, named Toch, who gave the first impetus to the petroleum trade of Austria. He had learned his business at our oil wells, and, arriving at Vienna, at once taught the refiners at Borgslaw how to make their industry profitable.

Hence, even if we must give to Galicia the credit of priority in the discovery of petroleum, we shall allow it only an empty honor, for we were the first to bring the product they neglected, and with whose value they failed to accouaint themselves, into general use as an illuminating agent, and to make it one of the staple articles of commerce. It was from us too, through Toch, that Austria learned how to utilize the oil of the Galician refiners. The question of first discovery is accordingly more interesting than important.—[New York Sun.

Labor Saving.

The demand of the people for an easier method of preparing Kidney-Wort has induced the proprietors, the well known wholesale druggists, Wells, Richardson & Co., of Burlington, Vt., to prepare it for sale in liquid form as well as in dry form. It saves all the labor of preparing, and as it is equally efficient, it is preferred by many persons. Kidney-Wort always and everywhere proves itself a perfect remedy.—Buffalo News.

Liquid or Dry.

Some people prefer to purchase medicines in the dry state so that they can see for themselves that they are purely vegetable. Others have not the time or desire to prepare the medicine, and wish it already to use.

Locked in a Closet.

[Wabash Plain Dealer.]

Last Friday afternoon, Mrs. T. W. McClure, living in the northwest part of the city, had occasion to go upstairs on some household duties, and took with her her twenty-months-old child. Stepping into the closet, the door of which locks with a spring, Mrs. McClure was horrified to find it suddenly pushed shut. She was as complete a prisoner as Guiteau, and the worst of it was the child was in immediate danger of falling down stairs. Strive as she would, Mrs. McClure could not burst the door open, and no amount of hallooing could be heard by any of the neighbors. She remained a prisoner for three hours, managing by one artifice and another to keep the child away from the stairway, until, at last, a neighbor dropped in and released her. Mrs. McClure was well nigh prostrated, and her fears for the safety of her child made her situation one of the most agonizing torture.

Comets.

The following list comprises the most important comets of the past ages:

When Mithridates was born there was a comet seen in the heavens of extraordinary size.

When Cæsar was assassinated, a comet appeared, and was visible in Rome by day as well as by night.

184 B. C.—In this year there was said to be one that was nearly as bright as the sun.

371 B. C.—There was a comet seen this year whose tail reached one-third across the heavens.

1106—A. D.—One was seen with a small head, but its tail rivaled the sun in brightness.

1264—The death of Pope Urban IV was heralded by a comet with a tail 100 degrees long.

1402—Witnessed two large comets.

1456—At the time of the capture of Constantinople by the Turks, there loomed up another so big and so frightful that Pope Calixtus II issued a bull against it.

1539—There was a comet so large and bright that it was seen in southern Europe at noonday.

1577—This comet was one of the largest ever seen.

Large comets were also seen in 1607, 1618, 1668 and 1680.

1653—In this year there was one that was said to be as bright as the moon.

1680—There was a comet with a tail 96,000,000 miles long.

1680—To the one that appeared at this time, the astronomer, Halley, gave his own name, after he had proved it to be identical with the great comets of 1531 and 1607, and predicted its return in 1759, which was fulfilled.

Other great comets were seen in 1744, 1769 and 1811.

1770—This was an erratic wanderer. When observed, the astronomers were astonished to find it moving in an orbit having a period of less than sixty years, although it had never before been seen, and was so bright as to be plainly visible to the naked eye. It was first brought to move into an orbit around the sun in consequence of coming within the sphere of the attractions of Jupiter. It made two revolutions around the sun. It returned and again fell in with Jupiter, where its attractions drew it so far out of its orbit that it has gone estray ever since.

1807—This comet was discovered by Poss, at Marseilles, September 27, 1807, and was followed for more than six months.

1812—This does not appear to have been an especially bright one, and would not excite attention at the present time, but that the observations show it to be moving in an elipse, with a period of about seventy years. Its return is therefore expected about this time.
